An important change has taken place in the administration of Ivinson Hall of the Cathedral School for Girls, Laramie. Miss Laura Jay Wurts found it necessary to resign her position as principal, after a service of several months. Her resignation was accepted with a vote of thanks and appreciation of her untiring services, and the Cathedral Chapter elected as her successor Mrs. N. S. Thomas, wife of the Bishop of Wyoming. Bishop and Mrs. Thomas will move their household effects at once to Laramie and make their permanent home there, as Mrs. Thomas has already taken the supervision of Ivinson Hall. The people of Cheyenne greatly regret their departure, but congratulate Ivinson Hall upon the honor that has come to it.

The Wyoming Clericus met at Bishopstowe in Cheyenne from October 19 to 25. All but one of the active clergy in Wyoming were in attendance, and the gathering proved to be one of the most helpful in the history of these conferences. The chief subject considered was Religious Education, and the clergy were so fortunate as to have with them for three days the Rev. William E. Gardner, D. D., Executive Secretary of the Department of Religious Education. His inspirational addresses carried with them enthusiasm and encouragement for the workers of Wyoming.

The papers read at the Clericus included "The Dispensation of the Spirit," by the Rev. Elvon L. Tull; "The Church School Service League," by the Rev. Howard R. Brinker; "Parish Program Conferences," by the Rev. Rowland F. Philbrook; "The Ministry of the Church," by the Rev. J. J. Dixon; "The Nation-Wide Campaign," by the Rev. Philip K. Edwards, and "The Open Forum," by the Rev. Samuel E. West. Dr. Laura A. White, of the University of Wyoming, read a paper on "American History at the Beginning of the Seventeenth Century."

The Rev. W. Waldo Weller, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, recently occupying the chair of French and European History at the East Greenwich Academy, R. I., has come to Wyoming to study for Holy Orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and to assist Dean Thornberry in his work among the students at the University of Wyoming. Mr. Weller is studying for special work in Religious Education. He is a graduate of Harvard, taking honors in 1904. He was appointed as Superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Church on the Isthmus of Panama, and acted as President of Panama College. He was abroad during the time of the war, and served as Vice-Counsel of the United States in Glasgow. In 1918 and 1919 he had charge of welfare work in the Eighth Colonial Division, and accompanied this division to Russia in 1920.

ARIZONA.

Rt. Rev. Julius W. Atwood, D.D., Bishop

What One Layman Is Doing.

Mr. E. C. Clark, of Tucson, has done as conspicuous work as a layman in Arizona as Mr. Sam Nash has in North Carolina. Beginning several years ago as Sunday school superintendent, lay reader and treasurer of Grace Church, Tucson, he has become increasingly useful until now he is available for use by the Bishop as a missionary to supply any mission that is without a minister, and at the same time superintends St. Luke's-in-the-Desert, one of the Church's Arizona homes for those ill with tuberculosis. All of his time is given to the work of the Church, and in the words of the Bishop, "all he costs us is the gasoline for his Ford."

Mr. Clark has just relinquished the care of Globe and Miami to the new rector, the Rev. Stanley V. Wilcox, of Philadelphia, after having visited these two missions twice a month for the nearly two years they had been without a rector. These two towns are among the largest and most important mine and smelter towns in the State.

At Globe, the parish house and rectory have recently received much needed repairs and improvements, and a Ford car has been secured for the use of the new rector, whose work covers not only Globe and Miami, but all of Gila County. A beautiful communion service used by the Rev. J. T. Addison, of the Cambridge Theological School, while a chaplain in France, has been given to the church here by Mr. Addison.

In Miami the congregation is still worshipping in the Y. W. C. A. building, but this is a temporary arrangement, and soon a Guild Hall Chapel must be built in this community of eight or ten thousand people.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Dr. Harry P. Nichols, after twenty-two years' service as rector of Holy Trinity Church, Harlem, New York, has resigned, and announced that he will take no other parish. To succeed him the Rev. William H. Owen, for sixteen years rector of Trinity Church, Mount Vernon, N. Y., has been chosen. He has resigned from January 15, and will enter upon his duties in Harlem when the Rev. Dr. Nichols retires on March 1. During his long rectorship at Holy Trinity a heavy debt has been paid off, in part by the congregation and in part from outside help, and the untoward conditions of Harlem, due to changes of population, have been successfully met. Dr. Nichols has been prominent in educational work in his Diocese, and in many other ways, and served as president of special conventions of the Diocese held after the death of Bishop Burch and upon the election of Bishop Manning.

The Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman, rector of Epiphany Church, has been elected to membership in the Chapter of the Washington Cathedral. This membership gives him the title of canon of Washington. The Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding nominated Dr. Freeman for this position.

The Rev. M. K. Crawford, who resigned the rectorship of St. Alban's Church, Bronx, because he wished to return to the Pacific Coast, has made the journey across the continent, forty-three hundred miles to his destination, in a Ford. His successor at St. Alban's is the Rev. George Leckonby, who comes from Trinity Church, Watervliet, Diocese of Albany. Mr. Leckonby was reared in Grace Parish, New York, and has held rectorships in the Middle West.

The Rev. Arthur P. Gray, Sr., now retired from the active ministry, was paralyzed recently at the home of his daughter, Mrs. R. B. Tyler, Lawrenceville, Va., where he and Mrs. Gray had gone to spend the winter.

The Rev. Oliver J. Whilden, of Baltimore, was recently presented with a handsome mahogany desk by his coworkers in the Province of Washington, at a recent meeting held in the Maryland Diocesan House, Baltimore The presentation was made in appreciation of his long and faithful labors as Secretary-Treasurer of the Society for the Promotion of Church Work Among the Deaf, which he founded in 1916. Mr. Whilden has resigned the arduous labors of this office, and will devote his entire time to his mission in Maryland.

The Rev. Clarence Wyatt Bispham, after an absence of two years in the Far East and England, has returned to America, and may be addressed care Central Union Trust Company, 80 Broadway, New York City.

The Rt. Rev. Edwin G. Weed, D. D., Bishop of Florida, who was operated on in October for the removal of a cataract from each of his eyes, has recovered and was able to attend the early celebration of Holy Communion on October 23, in St. John's Church, Jacksonville, Fla.

The Rev. C. R. Stetson, D. D., of Washington, has accepted the call recently extended him to become rector of Trinity Church, New York City, and expects to enter upon his duties in December.

The Rev. Rufus Benjamin Templeton, of Little Rock, Ark., has become rector of Holy Trinity Church, Gainesville, Fla., entering upon his new duties on November 6.

The Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., who has left White Plains, N. Y., is now living in New York City, at 206 East Seventy-second Street. His office is at Synod Hall.

Mr. Arthur H. Sargent, who is the lay worker in charge of mission work in Wythe, Carroll, Bland and Grayson Counties, Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, is preparing to make his headquarters at St. Barnabas' Mission (Piney), near Wytheville.

The Rev. A. B. Hunter, D. D., is in charge of St. James' Church, Florence, Italy, and in residence at 8 Via Venezia.

The general officers of the League of the Isolated are: President, the Rev. T. J. E. Wilson; Secretary, Miss Mary La. F. Robbins; Treasurer, the Rev. Martin Damer.

Ordinations.

In Christ Church, Marlborough, N. Y., on October 19, the Rev. Leighton Williams, D. D., was ordained by Bishop Manning before a large congregation of all denominations. After the ordination service DeWitt Braman, of New York, presented the keys of the church to Dr. Williams, and J. Ball, of Milton, presented those of Christ Church, Milton, of which parish Dr. Williams will also be rector. The Bishop preached the sermon, and the clergy present were the Rev. Mr. Crowley, of St. George's Church, Newburgh; the Rev. Mr. Dicks, of St. Paul's, Newburgh; the Rev. Hugh Hobson, of Ellenville, and the Rev. William Whitney, of Balmville. The ministers of all the other churches in the Collect for Thanksgiving Day.

O, most merciful Father, Who hast blessed the labors of the husbandman in the returns of the fruits of the earth; We give Thee humble and hearty thanks for this Thy bounty; beseeching Thee to continue Thy loving kindness to us, that our land may still yield her increase, to Thy glory and our comfort; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Great Hallel.

Psalm 118.

"When they had sung an hymn, they went out to the Mount of Olives."—Mark 14:26.

The music of that singing, amid tears
Has never died away; the holy song
Breaks forth, triumphant, still, through passing years,
Earth-voices thrill with joy, the heavenly throng.

"Come, let us keep the Feast!"—a joyful feast:
Though sorrow presses in—we will give praise—
Even as He sang that night—our Great High Priest—
In that blest room, the sacred song they raise.

And, as we sing our sweet Communion hymn—
Thy grace, O Blessed Master, draws us near;
Filling our cup of joy—aye! to the brim,
While still with Thee, we hold communion dear.

Sunday Meditations

On Preaching the Gospel.

Thomas F. Opie.

Nowadays the preachers are hard put to it to please the average congregation. People are critical. People are sensitive. People are hard to satisfy.

But there is much, it may be, in the charge that the preachers are not preaching the gospel—that is, that they are leaving the theme of Christ and have gone afield to talk about politics, economics, prohibition, amusements, capital and labor, literature, science, spiritism, etc., etc.

The word gospel means "good tidings." In this connection it means the good news of Christ, the Saviour. It would seem, then, that the preaching of the gospel has to do primarily with atonement, redemption, salvation, sin, repentance, confession and kindred subjects in their relation to the Christ—His birth, His life, His teachings, His suffering, His death, resurrection, ascension and the fundamental reason of it all.

Still there are many who contend that these things touch life in all its phases, and that it is the preacher's part to interpret the whole of life in its relation to God. This covers a man's relation to his fellows, his conduct, his character and his influence in business, in politics and what not. The preacher who interprets the signs of the times sets forth the spiritual and religious significance of modern phases of life in their relation to the redemption of the human race, and keeps his hearers conscious of the Christ and aware of God has a wide, a broad and a deep field. Of course, if he leaves religion, properly understood, to expound literature, science, art, political economy, he is open to censure.

Ingersoll used to say that the "preacher" would be superseded by the "teacher" in some such sense, he said, as "astrology" has been supplanted by "astronomy" and "alchemy" by "chemistry." That puts "preaching" in a bad way. But Ingersoll's father was a preacher—and maybe that accounts for it.

Happy is the congregation who has for its pastor and friend a preacher who is a teacher. But while he teaches, he must not fail to preach! To inform is not enough. He must reform.

The preacher must exhort, plead, urge. He must inspire and enhearten. He must warn, advise and sometimes censure and rebuke. He must condemn vice, injustice, dishonesty, fraud and hypocrisy. Hear the preacher patiently. It will not do you any harm and may do you a world of good.

The Coming Thanksgiving Day.

On no feature of the approaching Thanksgiving festival do our thoughts dwell with more satisfaction than on the family reunions to be enjoyed. If the day served no other purpose than to strengthen family ties and glorify the home its observances would be justified. Around the laden board and in the afternoon following thousands of family groups in America will come closer together than the thronging affairs of ordinary days permit.

At such times the lot of the homeless man or woman is particularly dismal. The hall bedroom and the boarding-house table lose what meager attraction they ever had. The youth alone in a great city, or traveling afar from familiar scenes, feels as never before that life without "folks," real people to know and love him, is a poverty-stricken thing indeed. Occasionally one gets glimpses into the loneliness that walks our city streets, retiring at night to cramped and hired quarters, and the vision is a really moving one.

Why not include in your invitations this year some unattached young man, some lonely young woman who would otherwise pass a cheerless day? Give the homeless a taste of home. Let them feel the joy of a genuine human welcome. How otherwise can you give and receive more pleasure?

It is easy to be selfish in the matter of hospitality. We are apt to entertain within the narrowest limits. A small and select circle of congenial friends or close relatives alone are eligible for our invitations. In the words of the apostle, we "salute our brethren only." Our feast is for "Me and my wife, my son John and his wife, us four, no more." No bars are higher than social ones.

St. Paul gave counsel to the early Christians that is not out of place for modern ones. "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers," he urges; giving as a reason, "for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." It is true, one may not often discover such celestial masqueraders among his guests; but he will very often find, what in this mundane sphere is better, friends altogether worth while. Some teacher from another State, some struggling young clerk from the country, some student recalling good times of other days in his own home—such guests as these may well be included for their own sakes and for the interest and life of the party.

"Never shall I forget the home opened to me on a Thanksgiving Day in college years. How good it was to leave the well-nigh deserted boarding-house. The friendship begun then has never been broken, but will remain, I trust, to life's end," said a certain college student.

Let us have a renewing of the old, gracious, essentially Christian grace of hospitality. A real home is one of the brightest blessings our earth knows. Why should it be possessed selfishly? Let one use it, occasionally, at least, to satisfy what a certain well-known writer calls the universal human "hunger for consideration" and to hearten for their journey some of our fellow-pilgrims.—Exchange.

On Peaceful Seas.

I watched a sail until it dropped from sight
Over the rounding sea. A gleam of white,
A last far-flashed farewell, and like a thought
Slipped out of mind, it vanished and was not.

Yet to the helmsman standing at the wheel,
Broad seas still stretched beneath the gliding keel.
Disaster? Change? He felt no slightest sign,
Nor dreamed he of that far horizon line.

So may it be, perchance, when down the tide
Our dear ones vanish. Peacefully they glide
On level seas, nor mark the unknown bound.
We call it death—to them 'tis life beyond.

—Author Unknown.

How Big Is a House?

The lecturer was describing and advocating modern, humane and intelligent methods of dealing with young children. As he paused for an instant, a grim-faced woman rose up. "Will you answer me one plain question?" she challenged him. "This shilly-shallying with children is all right at times, but there are times when nothing but a good spanking will do. What do you do when a child stamps his foot and says, 'I won't do it!'"

The lecturer waited. The questioner added nothing to her question.

"Do you call that a plain question?" he asked in an incredulous tone, as though he could not believe his ears.

"I certainly do," she said with satisfaction.

"Well, madame," said the lecturer, "I will answer that plain question if you will answer one of mine. How big is a house?"

The woman started. "That's not a plain question. What sort of a house?"

"Aha!" said the lecturer. "You can't answer me till I have told you what sort of a house? Well, I can't answer you till you tell me what sort of a child."

"I don't see what that's got to do with it," said the woman, but somewhat taken aback.

"Well, here's a case. A little child of three, very nervous, sensitive, recently over an illness, has been on a long, hot railway journey. At the end, exhausted from lack of sleep, excited to the point of distraction by the noise, and a thousand fears he cannot explain, with a beginning of stomach trouble from the irregular meals, he is told by some one who does not understand little children to carry a satchel much too heavy for him. Perhaps you would expect a three-year-old child to say, under such circumstances, 'I'm sorry, but I'm not feeling very well and it is really quite beyond my strength.' But I don't blame him a bit for stamping his foot and screaming. And certainly he does not deserve the same treatment as a loutish boy of fourteen who refuses to obey a reasonable request. And yet you expect some answer that will be the same for both."

Every child is different from every other child, and only his mother is in a position to know how to take him. All sets of circumstances are different from all others, and only those who know all about the case have any chance of guessing what is the right thing to do. You must do that most difficult of all things, think, and think hard, before you know what is the right thing to do. But before you begin to think, just remember that if a child stamps his foot and says, "I won't," to you, it is because you have brought him up wrong. When you see a dog that habitually snarls and shows his teeth, you do not say, "What a disagreeable nature that dog has." You say, "My! what a brutal master the poor creature must have had."—Selected.

The Necessary Outlet.

The electrician had stopped at the street corner to renew carbons in the arc lamp. A small boy had stopped to watch him. As the day was bright and sunny the boy was astonished to see that the man had on rubber boots. "What do you wear those boots for?" he asked. "Do you think it's going to rain?"

The workman laughed good-naturedly. "No, sonny, I wear them so as to be safe from electric shocks when I handle these lamps. Electricity can't go through rubber very well, and one of the funny things about electricity is that it can't get into a person unless it can get out again."

Is not that true of other things in life also? Take love. It can't get into a human heart unless it can get out again. It must either find an outlet in service or die. Yet many persons forget that truth. Young married people sometimes let themselves become indifferent to each other's needs and problems. Each feels that the burden of domestic care rests wholly on his or her shoulders. Instead of helping each other they grow cold and critical. Little by little the beautiful flower of love that at first filled the home with fragrance droops and dies. Love cannot live without service.

Forgiveness, too, can never get into a man unless it can get out again. Have you ever tried to ask God's forgiveness while you were secretly angry with some one who had done you either a real or a fancied wrong? The very doors of heaven seem locked against you. You cannot really pray, for, like love, forgiveness cannot bloom in the sterile soil of a selfish soul.

Whoever seeks the secret of human happiness will find it in these simple words, "Look well to the outlets of life." The clearest stream in the world will quickly become a stagnant pool if its waters find no escape. Clog the channels of usefulness with the rubbish of selfishness, harshness or indolence, and the streams of affection will soon become a foul and stagnant morass that reflects no loveliness and enriches no barren places.

In His Strength.

I will go in His strength—I have none of my own—
On His arm everlasting I'm leaning alone.
There is danger and darkness away from His side;
He is Sun, He is Shield, He is Safety and Guide.

When I thirst in the heat of the wilderness land,
Horeb's rock He will smite with His almighty hand;
When I hunger and faint in the wearisome way,
He will rain bread from heaven my spirit to stay.

In the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and the night,
He will speak, and my fears at His word will take flight;
And when from the waters of Marah I shrink,
He will sweeten their bitter before I must drink.

If long seems the journey and far seems the quest,
'Neath the palm trees of Elim I'll lie down to rest—
Dark or light, 'tis the same, for He goes on before,
The One who is refuge and strength evermore.

On wings of the eagle He'll bear me above
All the earth-mist and gloom to the home of His love,
From the heaven of heavens He'll hearken to me,
And at last in the morning His glory I'll see.

—The Evangelical Messenger.

Our Turning Points.

We often speak of turning points as if they were made for us by some outside power and as if in our life journey we came occasionally to some point where the road turns back. As a matter of fact, we make our own turning points, and can make them whenever we will. The path we follow is not walled up, so that we have no choice but to go on. At every step there is a chance to turn aside and start in a new direction. Do not wait to come to a turning point, for every moment brings one.—Exchange.

For the Young Folks

Only a Boy.

I'm only a boy, and sometimes it seems
To many people this only means
A lot of mischief and fun and noise,
For that is the way with growing boys.

I know all boys are fond of play,
But I've done some thinking along the way,
I am rough and careless at times, no doubt,
But I mean to keep clean inside and out.

When I play I play, when I work I work,
I'll not be a quitter, I will not shirk,
But a boy can work and a boy can play,
And be straight and clean, I am glad to say.

I'm only a boy, but then boys grow,
And I'll be a man some day, you know,
And I think it is up to a boy to see
That he grows the man that he wants to be.

Berry's Relief Ship.

Rob Gayton nailed the last slat across the front of the light wooden box and snapped his fingers at the roguish-looking prisoner inside.

Laurel was trying to comfort their small sister Berry, who was looking on from a pile of hay on the barn floor.

"Red Rover is only going back to the fox farm," urged Laurel. "Mr. Seymour will take good care of him and you can go over and see him any time."

Berry wiped her eyes and went down on her knees to peep between the slats of the box.

"Good-by, Red Rover," she said. "I never knew a baby fox could be such a dear as you've been this three weeks. I know you didn't steal the Jones ducks, and anyway, they hadn't any business coming off down here—so now!"

The little pet fox had been loaned to Berry by Mr. Seymour from the big fox farm on the hill. "You can keep the little chap for months, probably," Mr. Seymour had said. "He won't be big enough to get into mischief for a good while. As soon as he gets troublesome send me word and I'll come and take him home."

So the three young Gaytons had been having a fine time with this new pet till, as the weather turned mild, the Jones ducks had taken to coming down from the next farm and making themselves at home in the frog pond right here below the barnyard. One by one those ducks had disappeared and nobody could convince their owners that the little fox, small as he was, had not made way with them. So Red Rover must go back to the place he came from.

The three children went into the house and wondered what they should do all day. Father and Mother Gayton were gone, and Jerry, the hired man, would be chopping in the wood lot north of the house as soon as he had finished milking. Outdoors the prospect was not very inviting, for a long spell of thawing weather had made the snow too soft for coaching or snow-shoeing. It was the beginning of the slushy season, when it seems neither winter nor spring.

Laurel washed up the dishes and Rob filled the wood-boxes, then a shout from Berry brought them all to the east window.

"The field is 'most like an ocean," she said. "The brook is so full it's spilling all over everything. Look, there goes some of the pile of boards and things Jerry had out by the barnyard fence. They're sailing right down across the field. He's gone off to the wood lot and never noticed."

"Water's rising pretty fast, too," announced Rob as he looked. "But the buildings stand so high that we don't have to worry. If we had a boat it would be some fun to go out and cruise around. We could sail clear down to the pasture."

"Let's make a raft and go and see how Daddy Chickadee is getting along," proposed Laurel. "The water will be all around that knoll where his hut is, so he'll be on an island."

Daddy Chickadee was an old wood-chopper who had built a hut in the pasture to live in while he cut off the timber. His name was Chick, but the children had lengthened it to Chickadee because he always had a flock of the little black-capped birds around his camp.

"If he's on an island he may be starving," cried Berry. "We ought to fit out a relief ship and go right down there."

Rob laughed at the idea of Daddy Chickadee's needing a relief ship. "He always has plenty of supplies and he knows how to use that big cook-stove in his hut. It wouldn't be bad fun, though, to visit him, and there's two old shed doors in the barn that would make a raft as easy as winking."

They were soon ready to start. Berry would not give up the idea of the relief ship and Laurel was willing to pack a basket of sandwiches and doughnuts, with a warm apple turnover, and a thermos bottle of hot coffee. "Of course he might have got out of coffee since he has been living on an island," she said, "and he couldn't get off to buy anything."

Just before they sailed away they made a puzzling discovery. The box containing Red Rover had disappeared. They hunted for it in vain, and Rob suggested that Jerry must have found it when he came through the barn with his milk-pails and put it in some safe place. Jerry hated what he called a clutter on the barn floor, and he was always picking up and carrying away things the "young ones" had left lying around.

"Mr. Seymour won't come today, because the water is over the road by this time," said Laurel. "And of course the box is safe somewhere."

Berry looked worried over the matter. If Jerry had put the box somewhere, why couldn't they find it? But they had to give up the search and attend to their relief expedition.

They launched the raft right below the barnyard where the frog pond had spread out into a lake, and the little run of water, which generally trickled down through the field in a rill no more than a foot across, had become a wide stream flowing down to the flooded pasture.

They sailed over a low place in the fence and landed at the foot of the knoll upon which Daddy Chickadee's hut stood. The old chopper dropped his ax and threw his cap in the air at the sight of them.

"Hey, there," he called, "if I ever was glad to see anybody in my life it's you youngsters! If you've got anything to eat in that basket fetch it up."

As they scrambled to the top of the knoll they saw that the big camp-fire Daddy usually kept going night and day was dead out. The hut, too, was fireless and the big cook-stove looked cold and forlorn.

"Used up my last match day before yesterday," Daddy explained. "The rain put out my camp-fire in the night and there wasn't a spark left in stove, either, when I woke up. So I've been living on raw supplies—didn't have much cooked and was beginning to think I'd have to swim for the mainland or starve. I'm no great hand to go in swimming, specially this time of year."

Laurel set out the food on a log by the camp-fire which Rob soon had going, for he had matches in his tin box. Berry poured the old man's coffee while she explained to him about the relief ship. As she shook out the last drop from the bottle she lifted her head to listen.

"I keep hearing a funny noise down the other side of the knoll," she declared. "It sounds like ducks."

They all went to look, and in a swampy hollow full of water they saw every one of those missing ducks from the Jones farm. Coming down for a swim in the Gayton frog pond, they had followed that run of water down here to the pasture and liked the place well enough to stay.

"There now, I can keep my darling little fox!" cried Berry. "The idea of thinking he ate up those great big ducks—but oh, dear," she added, suddenly remembering, "he's lost! I'm afraid we'll never find him again."

They were pushing off the relief ship to go home when Rob jabbed his pole at something in the water.

"It's that old piece of a crate Jerry threw up top of the pile of boards by the barnyard fence. Here's some of the boards, too—the whole business has sailed off down here. What's this box drifted up here under the bank? It looks like"—

"It is!" shrieked Berry. "I can see Red Rover's eyes looking out at me through the slats. Jerry didn't notice there was anything in the box, or else he piled it up top of those boards to be out of the way and it sailed off with the rest."

They found the little fox unharmed, for the box had kept right side up. He seemed as glad to see them as they were to get him back.

"Laurel," said Rob, as they sailed away up the field, "we might as well give in that Berry's relief ship has turned out a big success, for all of our laughing."—Selected.

With many colored ribbons
That flutter in the light.
She gets from up the dawning
To brush the clouds apace,
And shake away the dewdrops
That dim each flower's face.

The little maid of Evening
Has tresses dark and dim,
Her dress is red and gold cloth,
With dusky lace to trim.
She hurries up the sky-path
When twilight flowers bloom bright,
To hang above the round earth,

The Prince and the Ponies.

L. E. Milburn.

The prince loved little boys, so he wondered, "What can I do to make the little boys in this kingdom the happiest boys in the world?" As he thought of the many happy days when he was a boy it seemed that his good pony Bob was always with him. Then he said, "I will send out and get all the ponies in the land and give one to each boy who is worthy of one."

He sent forth his men, who brought back a number of beautiful ponies.

Now the prince loved ponies almost as much as he loved little boys. So to the ponies he said, "You are to be given to the boys of this kingdom, but one thing I promise, no pony shall be forced to go to a boy whom he does not wish to have as his master."

Among the ponies was one so beautiful and so like his own dear pony that the prince named him Bob. The prince thought a long time as to which boy should have the beautiful Bob. One day he walked out and said, "Bob, of all the boys in this land I should like to give you to John; but one thing I have promised, no pony shall go to a boy whom he does not want as his master."

"Prince, Prince," said Bob, "of all the boys, I should like most to have John for my master, but for one thing. He has not yet learned to be always gentle with his little sisters and his little baby brother; and how can I know except by this whether he would always be a good, kind master?" Then he went on, "Prince, I love John so much I would like to wait a year to see if he will not learn to be always gentle."

That night, when John was fast asleep, the prince came to his bedside and in his ear he said, "John, of all the boys, I have selected you to have the pony Bob. But you know my promise to the ponies, and though Bob loves you best of all, he says you are not always kind to your little sisters and the little baby brother. He would like to wait one year and see if you love him enough to try to learn this one thing." John stirred in his sleep, and the prince thought he heard him murmur, "Oh, Prince, I do want Bob, and I will try to be the boy he wants for his master."

Next morning John wondered, "Was it a dream, or did the prince come to see me last night? Anyway, I shall try to be worthy of Bob."

A year later the prince went again to Bob and said, "Bob, you may have John or any boy in the kingdom as your master. Who shall it be?" "Prince," said Bob, "I want John of all the boys, for now he is always gentle and kind to his little sisters and his little baby brother."

Next morning, when John looked out his window, at the gate stood Bob, wearing a new saddle and bridle, all ready for a morning ride.

A Spool of Warp.

When I was a child I went one day to the weaver's house with rags that my mother had saved for a carpet. Once there, I lingered a while to watch the weaver at his work.

On a shelf at one side of the room were spools of colored string, which he told me were spools of warp. One spool I especially admired. It was a deep red; and the last thing I saw as I turned from the door was that spool standing there on the shelf.

A week later, when the carpet was done, I went back to the weaver's house. Mindful of the pretty spool of warp, I glanced toward the shelf. The spool was gone. When I asked the weaver about it he smiled and pointed to the end of a red cord in the fringe of the carpet.

After I had reached home with the carpet we spread it out on the floor.

"Look at that deep red thread running through it!" exclaimed mother. "It is just the touch needed to set it off. I should never have imagined that a little bit of red could make such a difference."

When I told mother of the spool of red warp at the weaver's and assured her that the thread in the carpet came from the spool she traced the thread as it twined in and out, and said, "Do you remember the thought I was trying to impress on you children last Sunday? The value of a life depends not on what it is by itself, but on its filling its proper place in God's plan. The spool of warp, beautiful in color though it was, would never have amounted to anything so long as it stood on the shelf. But here in the carpet, what a wonderful difference it makes."

Our lives will never amount to anything if we live them selfishly. But if we give ourselves to God, who is the great Weaver in the world, He will fit us into a place in the universe, and we shall serve a noble purpose, even though our lives are but cords running through the pattern of the Kingdom.—Youth's Companion.

How Two Hearts Were Mended.

"Yes, you did, too!"
"I did not!"
Thus the little quarrel started,
Thus by unkind little words
Two fond friends were parted.
"I am sorry."
"So am I."
Thus the little quarrel ended,
Thus by loving little words
Two fond hearts were mended.

FREE LESSONS IN MUSIC

Largest School Makes Wonderful Offer to Ambitious Students

An opportunity that will be eagerly seized by ambitious music lovers, both young and old, is being extended this month by the largest school of its kind in America, the U. S. School of Music of New York City.

By an entirely new and amazingly simple and easy method for teaching music—a system originated by this institution—more than 250,000 pupils have been successfully trained in their own homes to play the Piano, the Violin, Mandolin, Banjo, Organ, Cornet, Harp, Sight Singing, Guitar, 'Cello, Clarinet, Trombone, Piccolo, Flute, Ukulele, Saxophone, Harmony and Composition, Voice and Speech Culture, Drums and Traps, etc.

At a recent meeting of the board of directors the school decided to accept a limited number of new pupils to whom full courses of instruction will be given without charge in order to further advertise this new system for teaching music by mail.

All those who apply at once will be enrolled. Instruction will be given them at practically no cost — the sum charged amounting merely to about the cost of sheet music, postage, etc. The school is located at 225 Fifth Avenue, New York City, and any one interested can obtain full particulars simply by addressing a postal to the President, Mr. D. F. Kemp, Dept. 3711.

A CRUISE TO THE ORIENT

By the Rev. Andrew W. Archibald, D. D.,

Author of The Bible Verified, The Easter Hope, etc.

A sequel to the World War, whose dramatic ending is vividly sketched. Fascinating travel to the Near East under the changed conditions.

A compact yet graphic portrayal of the wonders and antiquities of Rome, Athens, Cairo, Karnak or Old Thebes, Constantinople and Jerusalem.

The volume not only contains clearly etched word-pictures of the places visited, but it is also illuminated with 64 illustrations, including the Pantheon and Parthenon, St. Peter's and San Sophia, Athenian Stadium and Pharaoh mummy, Jaffa Harbor and the Bosphorus, etc.

On the title page as guiding all the thought is the Christmasy quotation, "We saw His star in the east," making the book an appropriate holiday gift.

SPOKANE

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

Interesting Conferences Held Throughout the District.

In connection with the Nation-Wide Campaign and the Woman's Auxiliary, conferences were held October 10 to 20 by the Rev. Benjamin T. Kemerer and Mrs. Biller. Three days were spent at Spokane, two at Wenatchee, two at Ellensburg, three at Yakima and two at Walla Walla. The attendances at each place was quite satisfactory, and enthusiasm greatly roused in behalf of the N.-W. C. by the Rev. B. T. Kemerer, whose deep spirituality and practical earnestness won him friends all along the line of his pilgrimage, and Mrs. Biller proved herself capable and efficient in handling and holding the interest of the women. Bishop and Mrs. Herman Page accompanied them, and went with them to Pendleton, Ore., Diocese of Eastern Oregon, where a conference was held, all the clergy being in attendance and many of the laity. Individual conferences were also held, which gave excellent opportunity for the solving of many problems.

The new parish hall of St. David's, Ledgerwood, Spokane, was formally opened by Bishop Herman Page, October 26, various clergy and laity of other churches gathering together to add their congratulations to all concerned. This parish hall fills an urgent need, and will doubtless contribute to the building up of the Church in this vicinity of Spokane, which is under the leadership of the Rev. John G. Larsen, who is also rector at Hillyard.

Work at Walla Walla, under the administration of the Rev. Bertram A. Warren, continues to make satisfactory headway. The burden of debt which has been hanging over the parish for many years is being steadily reduced. A new parish hall has been erected. The outlook for this parish was never better or brighter than the present time.

Grace Church, Ellensburg, has a new rector in the person of the Rev. E. Leslie Rolls, formerly of Christ Church, Pyallup, Diocese of Olympia.

The Rev. Leonard K. Smith, vicar of St. James', Spokane, has instituted an evening Forum on Sunday evenings at Steven's Hall, in place of the regular service, and it is resulting in an increased attendance at the morning service, and also is leading people to examine more into the work and life of the Episcopal Church.

The Rev. W. A. Archibald Shipway celebrated his eighth anniversary as vicar of St. Matthew's Church, Spokane, Sunday, November 6, coming to the parish from the Diocese of Huron, Ont., in 1913. Mrs. G. H. Severence, wife of the Archdeacon, has recently introduced the Christian Nurture Series into two classes in the Church school. Plans for the proposed new church have been accepted, and it is hoped to begin building next spring.

The Church Normal School has held five weeks' lectures and courses under the leadership of the Rev. Lindley H. Miller, of St. Peter's, assisted by Deaconess C. Corbett and others. Sessions were held at All Saints' Parish Hall, Spokane.

Speakers to Tour the Diocese.

At a recent meeting of the Bishop and Council it was decided to organize a team of speakers and make a tour of the Diocese in the interest of Religious Education, the Nation-Wide Campaign and Publicity. The tour will start November 15 at Manhattan; then to Lawrence on the 16th; Chanute, 17th, and Wichita, 18th. Each place will gather as a deanery meeting. The probable speakers will be the Bishop, Sheffield Ingal, the Rev. W. A. Jonnard and Miss Nellie Smith.

Church Advertising: Quite an interesting campaign of Church advertising is being worked out for the whole Diocese by Mr. Haines, Emporia, Kan It is titled a "curiosity campaign," and he says it will work if we can get the Church people to follow the simple directions. He will be glad to furnish detailed information to any who may care to write him.

The Diocesan Convention will be held early in February, preceded by a "retreat" for the clergy. The Boys' Convention has been enlarged to include boys and girls, and will be held in June after Bethany College closes.

RESOLUTION PASSED BY THE WOMAN'S AUXILIARY OF THE DIOCESE OF WASHINGTON.

IN MEMORIAM.

On August 20 was laid to rest MISS JANE WILKES, daughter of the late Admiral Wilkes, U. S. N., in the ninety-third (93d) year of her age.

To few has it been given to spend so many years of love and devotion in the service of the Master and His Church. For thirty-five years president of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington, Miss Wilkes gave herself, her ripe experience, her wide sympathy, her large wisdom in never-failing devotion to the Church's Mission, and even when the ever-increasing burden of years obliged her to lay down the work, she continued an inspiration and counselor to those called upon to assume it. Her memory is a blessed heritage to all who knew and loved her.

"They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever."

SALLIE TAYLOR CASTLE.

Entered into rest, SALLIE TAYLOR CASTLE, at her lovely home in Norfolk, Va., November 8, 1921.

"We bless Thee, Lord, for the saintly ones amongst us,
Whom we have loved, and mourned, and laid to rest!
Whose lovely lives, ever shining found us,
Made bright the paths their footsteps pressed so near us!

"We bless Thee, Lord, that Thou didst lend them to us!
Precious jewels whom Thou wilt keep and wear!
And bless Thee, Lord, that friendly voices woo us,
To that blest land, where all our treasures are!"

J. D. L.

MRS. HEBE G. FENNACY.

On St. Luke's Day, October 18, 1921, at her late home, Ashland, Ky., MRS. HEBE G. FENNACY, widow of the late A. R. Fennacy, fell asleep in Jesus.

Mrs. Fennacy was the daughter of Robert and Sophia Berkely Carter, formerly of Virginia.

The greater part of her life, with the exception of childhood and early years, was spent in Ashland, Ky.

She was a most devoted communicant of Calvary, Church, Ashland, and entered into every good work, both of the church and the community.

The end, emblematic of her life, was quiet and peaceful; and came just as she would have desired.

Gentle, sympathetic and unassuming, ready always with a word of cheer or deed of love, her influence and memory will be ever cherished in the hearts of those who knew and loved her.

The burial took place on the 21st, and surrounded by loving friends she was laid to rest.

"For all the saints, who from their labors rest,
Who Thee by faith before the world confessed,
Thy Name, O Jesus, be forever blest.
Alleluia."

IN MEMORIAM.

ANNIE TUCKER TYLER.

Died, in the sixty-seventh year of her age, at St. Luke's Hospital, Richmond, Va., on Wednesday, November 2, 1921, at 10 o'clock A. M., after an illness of several months, ANNIE TUCKER TYLER, wife of Dr. Lyon G. Tyler, and daughter of the late Colonel St. George Tucker, of the Confederate Army, poet and novelist, and of Elizabeth Gilmer, daughter of Thomas Walker Gilmer, Governor of Virginia, and for some time Secretary of the Navy of the United States. Her father was well known as author of "Hansford, a Tale of Bacon's Rebellion," and as author of the "Cross of the South," a stirring lyric, which was very popular in the South at the beginning of the war for Southern independence.

However, it was not the lineage from which she sprang that ennobled this much-lamented lady, but her own character. Never lived a person who had sweeter and more lovely traits. As wife of one who had charge of William and Mary College, as president, for many years in its days of trial and struggle, she was endeared to hundreds of young men who attended the courses of that ancient and honorable institution. During that time, of how many entertainments for the college circle was she the guardian genius, and of how many visitors from all over the world was she the sweet and genial hostess!

Mrs. Tyler was formerly president of the Williamsburg Chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy, and was at the time of her death a member of the Governing Board of the Colonial Dames of the State of Virginia, a member of the A. P. V. A., and other useful and patriotic organizations. To her was principally due the erection of the monument to the soldiers and sailors of the Confederacy, which stands today on the Palace Green in Williamsburg.

During her long illness her room at St. Luke's Hospital was a flower-garden, made so by the devotion of her friends. She loved flowers as the emblems of immortality, and with the certainty of death before her she said, "I am seeing the flowers on my grave before I die."

Attacked by disease when she never appeared so well or so happy, she confronted the inevitable with a calmness that was simply marvelous to those who love life, and she had every reason to be as one of these; for, beloved by her husband, children and friends, and surrounded by many of the good things of earth, it seemed especially hard for her to leave them. But she looked death nobly and bravely in the face and never questioned or complained. Was it her faith in a future life that sustained her? As she drew nearer to the end she was weak and passed most of the time in a semi-unconscious condition, but in the dead hour of the night, shortly before her death, while her husband was watching by her side, she cried in a strong, clear voice, "Oh, Jesus, take me to Thy arms. Oh, God, care for Thy child!" It was touching to observe how, almost to the very last day, when any of her dear friends entered the room, she would rouse from her comatose state and greet them by name and with a warmth of her old cordiality. Her sufferings were intense, but they were greatly relieved by the sympathy of her visiting friends, and the tender care of her physicians and nurses. At last, after an interval of peace, she passed into eternal rest with just a sigh.

The esteem in which she was held was attested by numerous letters of sympathy after her decease, received from members of Congress, former Governors, judges of courts and others in public prominence; from the president and faculty, students and alumni of William and Mary College, and from many of her numerous acquaintances in every condition of life throughout the State and Union.

Her body was taken from St. Luke's Hospital to the home of Charles G. Bosher, 422 East Franklin Street, where her face, freed from its suffering and care and seeming among the roses that surrounded it like that of some beautiful queen, was viewed by many friends.

The final services took place on Thursday at 4 o'clock P. M. at Holy Trinity Church, under the ministration of Rev. J. J. Gravatt, assisted by Rev. E. R. Jones, rector of Bruton Church, Williamsburg, which she had attended so many years during her stay in that city. The floral decorations were beautiful and even magnificent. She was interred in the Tyler section in Hollywood the same afternoon.

village were present. An augmented choir rendered the musical program and a reception was held at the rectory after the service.

On October 10 Mr. Frederick W. Jones, one of the nine members of St. Mark's, Raymond, Miss., was ordered deacon by Bishop Bratton. Bishop Green preached the sermon. Mr. Jones was presented by his rector, the Rev. Val H. Sessions; the Rev. Albert Martin read the Litany. Mr. Jones' ordination is of more than usual interest owing to the fact that he is leaving a very successful business life for the ministry. He is forty-five years of age and has a wife and two children. He will be in charge of the Hollandale field, occupying the rectory just completed.

Mother Bear and Her Lost Cub.

Two little bears up in a tree! That was what Mr. Drake saw as he was coming home late in the afternoon through the wood-path. No one can explain to this day why Mother Bear, contrary to all the rules of her tribe, went away and left them, but there must have been some very important reason.

"I must have one of those cubs," said Mr. Drake to himself, and, as he was a very determined sort of person, he took off his coat and climbed the tree. How that young bear, true to his wild nature, did scratch and bite, as the man threw a coat over his head!

It was a difficult matter to bring that fighting cub down the tree, for he was a heavy little fellow and his teeth and claws were exceedingly sharp, but Mr. Ddake finally succeeded in reaching the ground with him, and with great trouble carried him home.

He placed a collar around his neck and hitched him with a long strap to a staple driven in the side of the wood-shed. The children came from far and near to see the little wild creature, who did not relish his new quarters in the least, and bit and clawed savagely if any one came near him.

At first he would not eat, but finally hunger drove him to lapping milk and eating the food that Mr. Drake brought to him, but he made friends with no one.

One night Mr. Drake heard a weird call which sounded something like the hooting of an owl.

"That old bear is around," the man thought. "She's trying to call the young one."

The calling sounded for three nights, and the little bear would cry and whimper unhappily. Then one morning, when Mr. Drake went out to milk his cows, he found that Baby Bruin was gone. He had gnawed off the strap, and had run away to join his mother.—Ella S. Bowles.

Do we distinguish in our own experience between the hearing of God and seeing Him? Too often we read in Scripture what others saw and found in God, and are content with the hearing of their experiences. But when our heart has been ploughed with some keen grief or deep anxiety, Scripture becomes a new book. We feel that God is addressing us with a living voice, and with the immediacy of a direct appeal.—F. B. Meyer.

Week-Day Church School

By WALTER ALBION SQUIRES

Director of Week-Day Religious Instruction, Presbyterian Board of Publication

The book has been written on the assumption that the week-day church school movement is more than an experiment; therefore the author evaluates the movement in the entirety, as well as in its various forms in different communities.

"The literature on this subject is growing, and fortunate is the man who does not let the movement get too far ahead of his thinking."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"One must have king-recognizing eyes
To recognize the king in mean disguise."

We can give thanks with the hand as well as with the heart.

How shall we give thanks? Words are good and necessary; but deeds are imperative. "As ye did it unto these My brethren, ye did it unto Me."—Ex.

"In" everything give thanks, not for everything.

The cheerful heart lubricates the wearing machinery of business and daily care. It is a "continual feast."—T. L. Cuyler.

"Look at your mercies with both eyes; your troubles with one eye."

"The crucified but victorious Christ challenges America today as He challenged Israel of old, to declare in what manner of deity the people believe."

"Cannon may be the last argument of kings, the cross the last argument of despots; but Truth is the last argument of peoples."

Mixed with sweet thoughts may be sad memories, and there may be a vacant chair; but this may be only as at night we go to our different chambers to meet again in the morning.—Homiletic Review.

Some church members are like the automobiles of several years ago—they need a great deal of cranking before they can be made to go, especially in spiritually cold weather. A self-starter attachment in the nature of an inner consecrated spirit and motive would improve them wonderfully.

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., NOVEMBER 26, 1921. No 48.

LOOKING FORWARD TO THE GENERAL CONVENTION

The thought of the Church is already turning toward the next General Convention, which is to meet in September, 1922, in the city of Portland, Ore.

In the Church papers discussions are multiplying as to matters which this Convention must take up. There is the transcendent question of Prayer Book Revision. How far will this Convention be able to complete the revision, and what should be the program by which the revision may best be expedited? What plans shall the Church adopt for the continuance of the Nation-Wide Campaign when these first three years of it come to an end? What shall the Church do concerning a closer relationship with the Federal Council of Churches? These are some of the questions upon which the Convention at Portland must pass, and in a few weeks the Diocesan conventions of 1922 will in some dioceses be convening, and delegates to the Convention will commerce to be elected. It is of interest, therefore, to all the Church to know what manner of city the Convention is to meet in; and for this purpose—though time be taken by the forelock—we publish this week, through the courtesy of the Oregon Churchman, the illustrated articles describing the beautiful city of the West, to which more and more in the coming months the mind of the Church will be turning.

THE CORPORATE COMMUNION ON ADVENT SUNDAY

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew has done a fine thing for the Church in bringing to all the parishes the suggestion for a Corporate Communion of men on the morning of the first Sunday in Advent. The Brotherhood has had printed, and has made available for all the churches, poster-notices of the Communion to be signed by the rector and placed in the vestibule, and cards of special invitation to be issued by the Brotherhood chapters to all the men of the congregation, reading as follows:

First Sunday in Advent,
November 27, 1921.

Annual Corporate Communion of the Men and Boys of the Church.

To.....

November 27th is the First Sunday in Advent, the beginning of the new Church year. There will be a celebration of the Holy Communion in our church that morning at .. o'clock.

It is fitting for the confirmed men and boys to gather at this service and there offer their united petitions for God's blessing upon the Church during the coming year.

I hope, therefore, that all male communicants of this church will come to this service. St. Andrew's Day, the following Wednesday, the 30th, suggests we follow the example of that beloved Apostle and bring another with us!

Surely there could be no better beginning of the Church year for the men of the Church than that they should gather in the early morning of Advent Sunday at the Table of the Lord. With most men the Communion is too seldom kept. They are interested in the side of religion which "does things," but they are not instinctively drawn to the quiet contemplativeness of the sacrament where the soul waits and worships. Thereby they miss the secret of their truest power. For no soul will ever do great things for Christ which has not first received from communion with Him His Spirit and His Presence. We may peddle with little ecclesiastical practicalities here and there, but we cannot fill the Church with His life until we have had His life given to us.

So we hope that this plan for corporate communions of men on Advent Sunday will be greatly answered everywhere in the Church; and we should like to think that men who read these words will for themselves individually determine to mark the beginning of the new year of the Church's calendar by their own presence at this communion.

A CHANCE FOR HELPFUL SUGGESTIONS

Some weeks ago we printed an editorial urging that the Publicity Department of the Church consider the matter of preparing some beautiful poster, for use in Sunday schools, church vestibules and other places, which might carry in visible appeal the first message of the Nation-Wide Campaign for this year—namely, the call for new recruits for the ministry and for the Church's missions. It seemed to us that the Church might well make use for spiritual ends of that colorful and dramatic form of winning attention to a great cause which was made so familiar for patriotic ends during the war. After the editorial was published we wrote to the Rev. Robert F. Gibson, Secretary of the Department of Publicity, calling his attention to it, and we have received from him this reply:

"You ask whether it has seemed practicable for the Publicity Department to do anything to carry out the suggestion in your editorial on 'Posters for the Church.'

"It has not seemed practicable for the Publicity Department to do anything up to this time. In the first place, we have been pressing the Church pretty hard in the matter of the Centennial and of the Campaign. The limited number of posters we felt justified in putting out had to relate definitely to these matters. But this pressure will soon be over.

"The second reason is that the Publicity Department as such cannot inaugurate a project of this sort. It is outside of our province, as we serve merely as a publishing department except in matters definitely pertaining to publicity. We do aid the other departments in all such matters and do make suggestions. And in view of your letter, I will take the matter up with the Department of Religious Education, which is in charge of all matters pertaining to recruiting for the ministry. I feel quite sure that the idea would appeal to them if they had something definite to act upon. As you of course realize, the most difficult part of a poster project is to get the original conception for the poster. Have you anything definite in mind? It is easy enough to find a good artist and to turn his work into a poster, and it probably would not be difficult to find the money necessary. But where is the original idea on which to base the poster?

"Please send me any ideas or suggestions you have, both as to the subject matter of the poster and the size and character of the poster, and I will take the matter up with Dr. Gardner.

"With all good wishes, I am,

"Sincerely yours,

"ROBERT F. GIBSON."

The idea which we had in mind was the creation of such a poster as should suggest the spiritual knightliness of the true ideal of the ministry and of missionary service, and so should wake that fine romance which lives—sometimes unconscious—in the heart of youth, and which, when stirred, can lead to high decisions and unselfish consecration. We believe Watts' "Sir Galahad" could be used for such a poster; or "The Knight's Vigil." But these are only tentative possibilities. The reason we publish Mr. Gibson's letter is to ask that those of our readers who may have had experience in the making of effective posters, or who possess in any degree the artistic and poetic imagination which enables them to conceive how a poster for recruiting the Church's leadership had best be made, should send us their suggestions.

A CONFERENCE FOR BOYS ON THE MINISTRY

Presently, on one of the Sundays in Advent, we shall be offering up the prayer which begins, "O Lord Jesus Christ, Who at Thy first coming didst send Thy messengers to prepare Thy way before Thee," and we shall think, perhaps, of the Church's need of more young men for her ministry if messengers are to go forth to prepare the way for a new advent of the Master's spirit in power for our world today.

In that connection, therefore, we wish to publish, and to commend with hearty approval the plan which is outlined in the following communication from Dr. S. S. Drury, which has come to us just as this issue of the Southern Churchman goes to press:

"Five of us, two laymen and three priests, met on October 21, in New York, to consider the whole question of a boy Conference on the Ministry. The Rev. Dr. Atwater came from Akron, O.; Dr. William Jefferys came from Philadelphia; Rev. Dr. Ogilby was there from Trinity College, Hartford, and Harper Sibley, Esq., from Rochester, N. Y. It was an informal group, not representing official bodies or movements. We came together under the compulsion of an idea—that our Church needs more and better ministers, and that perhaps we could help to increase the ministry. With prayer we began; with prayer we ended; and our deliberations lasted six hours. At times everything seemed bewildering, but even so we trudged forward on the divine adventure. An idea is a strange guide. The path it follows is not all smooth going; the way seems blocked with forebodings; and even the goal is sometimes hidden in mist. Yet any idea that springs from God's love and man's need overcomes all obstacles. As our day passed and as the problems became clear-cut and settlable, we felt an increasing sense of certainty and power.

"The first problem, Shall we have a conference for boys next summer to consider the ministry? deserved and received ample discussion. You can yourself supply the pros and cons! Shall we have such a meeting anyway? Is it needed? Is it timely? Shall it be specifically about the ministry, or about life work, which will include the ministry? We decided to call it, and to make it, a meeting of boys to consider the ministry. Next, when shall we have it? More discussion—evoking many practical comments. We decided that the best date was the end of June, a few days after high schools close, and entrance examinations for college are through with. Again, where shall we have it? That's a big problem. Finally we settled on St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., where all the members will be entertained, and can enjoy ample diversion between the main affairs. There will be a conference (just how long we don't know yet) at St. Paul's School, starting about June 28, welcoming boys of high school age to consider the ministry.

"The committee asked me to write to all of our bishops, describing these plans. This bulletin, which is addressed not only to chance readers, but to vestrymen and rectors, follows on the letters to our bishops. Our committee, asking the wise guidance of the Church's Commission on the Ministry, will meet again in December. We hope and plan for a well represented gathering in New York on January 18, when the whole project can be developed. If this January meeting is attended by men of vision and program, who see the need and who will to serve it, we ought to develop something which will stir the imagination of vestries, the consciences of rectors, and the hearts of boys.

"Does the plan, as thus far developed, sound vague and amateurish? Well, even so, don't condemn it yet awhile. We hope, as the time goes on, to be business-like and definite, but we make no promises to be highly organized or bristling with technique. There is one thing that we all plan not to do; and that is, not to try to develop a spirit of emotionalism at the Conference, and not to allow any boy to commit himself then and there to the ministry as his career. All people who may feel an interest in this simple, informal gathering must promise to get that point straight from the start. We are not going to corral candidates for the ministry; we are hoping to get a hearing on the ministry from a goodly number of our most promising Church boys.

"The reader is wondering, as he thinks ahead to next June, how many boys will attend such a conference. The writer is wondering about that, too. Our Central Committee also has naturally considered that question. Will there be fifty, or two hundred and fifty, or perhaps will only a handful finally arrive? Let us lay the spectre of numbers. If figures had impressed our Lord, He could have summoned twelve legions of disciples, instead of twelve. Better put the numerical problem in the background. If each parish and group of alert vestrymen grasp the bearing of this project, and definitely foresee the need of the Church a few years hence; if such Christian groups select from its best boys one or two who in open-minded fashion agree to consider the ministry as a career; if faithful prayers and glowing common sense guide us—the Conference next June, be it large or small, will represent an honest effort to fill an actual need.

"Remember! The inspiration of our young people begins at home, and their parents and parishes should give the impetus to consider the ministry. The men who are getting up this Conference will work their hardest to provide the best sort of a conference, but they should not sully vocation to the ministry by canvassing for recruits. A conference is offered to the Church. Will rectors, vestries and parents in turn offer it to their boys?"

SAMUEL S. DRURY.

PERSONAL IMPRESSIONS OF THE ARMAMENT CONFERENCE

By Dr. Charles S. MacFarland, General Secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in Ameriea

TWO official events at the Capitol and one of an unofficial nature combine to inspire one with the hope that the moral and spiritual conscience of the nation is again stirring and finding expression.

The two official occasions were so blended in spirit and associated in time as to create a sensé of oneness.

The burial of the "Unknown Soldier" was a fitting expression of the nation's recognition and gratitude for the spirit of human sacrifice shown in the war. The popular reception of former President Wilson was evidence of the vitality of ideals of national unselfishness, while the Conference on Limitation of Armament followed with startlting immediateness to put those ideals into the form of reality.

Yes, it may all be interpreted as hopeful evidences of a re-awakening of the nation to its opportunity, responsibility and mission, and, still more important, of the awakening of the official representatives of the nation.

It is no exaggeration to say that the spirit of Washington has been religious during these five days, from the beginning of the tributes to the "unknown" at the Capitol on Thursday, initiated in the morning by the Federal Council of Churches, to the close of the second session of the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which I have just left. The opening of the Conference by prayer, followed by the President's message, had the sense of a continuation of the services by Chief Chaplain Axton and Bishop Brent at Arlington.

That this religious policy had a deep effect on the Conference is beyond dispute. This has been remarked upon again and again by members of the foreign delegations as the Commission of the Federal Council has met them to extend its welcome and to emphasize the moral and spiritual character of the mission on which they have come. And they have remarked upon it with appreciation and satisfaction.

As to the Conference, everybody, or nearly everybody, is agreed that it has made a great beginning. It has done much to release at once the body from the hands of diplomacy.

Let us, however, not mistake the beginning for the end. It is not done yet. True, enough has elapsed to bring to the surface the problem, doubts, questions, obstacles and consequent cross currents. It would be foolish not to reckon with them. They are here. The danger of reaction in the Conference itself is to be guarded.

These problems will continue to the end, and then—when the end is reached—may come, for America, the greatest problem of all—

How shall the decisions be put into effect? By what body or organization? Who shall constitute the "Continuation Committee"? What shall be the associational relationship to perpetuate and insure the agreement? Finally, where will the United States stand in this, which some of the foreign delegates declare is the final issue, after all?

The last days of the Conference may thus be as striking and intense as the first.

Our people must not be misled. The happy issue of the present moment was clearly the result of popular feeling expressed over the entire nation without reserve. It comes mainly from three clear sources—the churches, the workers and the women.

Most observers put it in that order and point to the widespread religious tone of the press, the religious sentiment evident in the Conference, and, above all, the fact that everywhere the issue is treated with religious tone and sanction.

The delegates I have met have remarked the influence of our churches and the extent of which "a free Church in a free State" gives evident power and boldness to the Church. One said, "It is not so in Europe; we do not look or listen to our churches. It might be better if we did."

No, the end is not yet. There are many dangers if our people fall back into apathy or indifference. Strong, constantly sustained interest and wisely formed and directed public opinion must continue and must be in readiness for any moment or event.

The contacts, correspondence and cable relationships between our Church bodies in the other nations will be maintained.

This is not yet the time for the churches to pronounce the benediction. I believe that time is coming, but meanwhile our preachers and our churches must watch and pray.

A SECOND CALL TO 150,000 CHURCHES IN AMERICA

THE bold and noble policy for the reduction of the navies announced by Secretary Hughes was made possible by the nation-wide insistent demand of the people.

We must now support that policy with utmost vigor until the Conference adopts it and Congress has actually enacted the American laws that will put it into operation. For this the persistent drive of the churches is imperative. Lions are still in the way. And the European and Far Eastern problems are still to be considered, which need a Christian solution.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America is issuing this second call to the churches to push forward the great work so well begun. Splendid results were secured from their work done in October and from the nation-wide observance of November 6 and 11. But the campaign for a warless world is only well begun. The Washington Conference will continue many weeks. Our campaign must continue until war is outlawed, and the whole war system is abolished by the firm establishment of an effective peace system.

The Federal Council is in constant communication, both by letter and by cable, with the Church bodies of the other nations, in order that this sweeping expression of public sentiment may be international, and may come in upon the Conference from the peoples of all nations concerned.

The Federal Council now urges the churches:

1. To promote the earnest study in every church of international questions by adult and young people's study groups and in prayer meetings. At the close of the courses suggested it would be helpful if each group would write to the appropriate Senators and Representatives in the House, expressing the conclusions to which it has been led.

2. To continue in every Sunday service and on every other possible opportunity to pray for the success of the Conference, and to educate the people on the Christian principles involved in establishing and maintaining right international relations.

3. To hold public meetings in every city, unitedly wherever possible, some time in November or December, in behalf of America's courageous proposal to the nations.

4. To emphasize afresh in the service at Thanksgiving and Christmas time the Christian belief in a warless world and in an immediate and sweeping reduction of armament as an imperative step toward the ultimate goal.

5. To organize in each of the larger cities a Committee on International Justice and Goodwill, representing all the churches, for vigorous and continuous co-operation in the long and serious campaign against the whole war system by establishing an effective peace system.

6. To keep in touch with the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in order that the many regiments and armies of the Church may keep step and may march together in their war to end war.

The Federal Council's program includes:

1. A pamphlet (shortly to be issued) on the problems in the Pacific and Far East and a study course upon it.

2. Wide distribution of informing and stimulating literature.

3. Promotion of systematic discussion in the churches of the issues involved.

4. Continuation of the Federal Council's campaign of publicity through the press.

5. Carrying forward this educational campaign until the end of the Conference, and until our representatives in Congress have ratified a satisfactory basis of permanent peace among the nations.

PORTLAND, THE ROSE CITY

Bowered in Fragrant Blooms and Watched Over By Snowy Peaks

By John W. Lethaby

IF you will sit on the Magic Carpet we shall fly over plain and mountain towards the golden waters of the Pacific. There, like a green jewel in a setting of silver, you shall see Portland, the City of Roses, guarded by the shining snow-clad summits of Mount Hood, Mount Adams, Mount St. Helens, and, far to the left, Mount Rainier, like the pearly ghost of an Everest.

The Rose City bids you welcome. For miles of boulevard you will find Tennyson's "roses, roses all the way." Cascades of gold and crimson and white embower the homes of our citizens. At Christmas you may step into your door-yard and pluck a La France for your buttonhole. In the many parks are collected, from all over the world, rare specimens of the Queen of Flowers.

Portland, Oregon, the Convention City.

The City that is the gateway of an inland empire bids you watch the ships come in from the seven seas and sail out again with lumber and grain and fruit and milk and honey. Portland stands on the threshold of a new era of commercial expansion. At St. Johns rises the terminal of a far-flung system of transportation. New industries are springing up and a spirit of optimism is in the air. In 1925 Portland will be host to the world for an exposition that will reveal the undreamed of resources of the great Northwest.

Let us swing round the city, and watch the ever-changing scene. Filling a complete block is the Public Library, massive, four-square, a dynamo-house of good influences. It gives out more books per capita than any other library in the United States. It stretches out hands of welcome to the foreign-born and serves all the schools with splendid completeness.

The Municipal Auditorium that will be the meeting-place of the General Convention has one of the finest pipe-organs in the country, and serves as the citizens' forum. The City Hall, with its pillared beauty; the court-house, dignified in granite and marble; one of the great banks, an exact replica of a temple at Athens; green parks, clean streets—shall be milestones on a journey of delightful memories. Portland, the home city, with its terraces of flowers, its hedges of roses, its velvet lawns, its spirit of warm hospitality, has a unique charm for the visitor.

Through avenues of pink and white we travel over smooth roads to the great Columbia Highway. You who have looked out of the stone windows of the Axenstrasse or glimpsed the blue sea from the Corniche, will find here a modern miracle. The dream of a great engineer come true. Fifty miles of scenic beauty. Crown Point, perched seven hundred and fifty feet above the Columbia, gives a panorama without equal in the world. Good St. Peter himself is honored on the wide highway. A wonderful monolith towers up into the sky, majestic, inspiring, unique. Until the crack of doom shall St. Peter's Dome keep watch over the shining river!

At Shepperd's Dell we may visit the "Playground of the Fairies" and sit in quiet loveliness amid the tinkle of the gently falling waters. Over great concrete bridges our car spins on along a roadway cut from the solid rock.

At a sudden turn you stop with wonder, "silent, as on a peak in Darien." A silver mist drops for seven hundred and sixty feet, breaks into a veil of pearly lace, and drops down in a fern-circled pool to join the waters of the old-time Oregon. Old Chief Multnomah may visit the falls that bear his name of moonlit nights, when amethyst and amber tint the falling torrents. For the dusk is full of voices that sing the song of the mountain and the pine.

Sixty miles from Portland as the crow flies, Mount Hood lifts its gleaming peak over eleven thousand feet above the sea. We who know the forest trails winding through green tunnels of quiet beauty can lead you to lakes set like sapphires in the shadow of the snowy sentinels of Oregon. Within a few hours of your hotel we may sit beside a rushing mountain stream and find our supper in the trout so abundant. You may camp in the very shadow of Mount Hood, and as you cook your bacon, your breakfast view shall be great meadows carpeted with blue lupin and scarlet painter's brush. At Lost Lake you shall see at night such a nocturne of blue and silver as Whistler never dreamed of. With Portland as a center, mountains of the Northwest are all accessible. Crater Lake, a deep blue cup with craggy rim, the Mackenzie River, with what Kipling calls "the finest fishing in the world," lead you to the Sisters, and the gateway of Eastern Oregon.

When the hour comes to say "au revoir" to the Rose City, come to the King's Heights, and watch the moon rise over the sleeping city. Shut in a garden, Portland surely has "a goodly heritage." The river makes a ladder of gold, and far away to the horizon gleam the home-lights of a hundred thousand happy homes. Like a golden glow-worm the car climbs the height of Council Crest. A church bell chimes the hour. From a colonial bungalow surrounded by a riot of gladiolus and dahlia come voices in glad laughter, and the whisper of the "Humoresque." Mountains, forests, streams, temples, banks, marts, stores, granaries * * * to and fro the eye wandered in amaze until it came back to the open door through which the red firelight glowed. Into the perfumed night came two lovers. The future of Portland lies in its young people. They are dreaming of a greater and a better West. If their dreams come true, mayhap that the Pacific Coast may be the cradle of a new race and the frontier of a finer civilization. Once again the bells ring out. Beneath all the beauty and the charm of our city lies a hidden fire—the quenchless spirit of a people that know their destiny is great.

The mountain preaches a sermon by night and day, that the shining heights of success are to the pioneers of thew and sinew. At pearly dawn, in sunset glow, at high noon, the great peak watches over the city. It is the magnet that draws men from desk and shop to the refreshment of its cool recesses. It is a friend whose face we miss when cloud-wisps veil his summit. Roses and mountain snow: green mead and forest aisles, it would take old Homer to strike his lyre, and tell of the beauties of the friendly city of the Great Northwest.

PORTLANDS' PUBLIC AUDITORIUM

Where Convention Will Meet

LOCATED at Third and Clay Streets, the auditorium is designed and fully equipped for meetings and conventions of large magnitude.

The normal seating capacity is 3,800, with 1,590 seats on the main or lower floor and the remainder divided between two balconies. This capacity may be increased to a maximum of 8,500. By use of two side assembly rooms which may be opened into the main auditorium by removal of sliding partitions, the capacity is 5,500, and by placing seats on the stage the capacity is 6,300, and by utilizing the available standing room the capacity is 8,500.

In addition to the main auditorium, the building has six large rooms suitable for meetings, exhibits, etc., and immense basement suitable for large exhibits, a mammoth stage, and many other features, making it available for a multiplicity of uses. All of these parts may be connected together when the entire space is needed for one attraction.

The policy of those in charge is to make the great building a great public forum and a great municipal theater and meeting place, where large crowds may assemble under the most favorable conditions to discuss subjects of the day, hold public celebrations and demonstrations and enjoy musical and other attractions of a big order.

The movement for a public auditorium in Portland dates beak to 1900, when the need for a large meeting place was first felt. The idea developed during a period of ten years until it became an issue at the municipal election, June 5, 1911, when a bond issue for $600,000 was approved by the voters.

The cornerstone was laid September 14, 1916, and the building was dedicated July 4, 1917. The cost of the structure, including furnishings, was $600,000.

Portland's auditorium is on the outskirts of the retail business district and is served by two car lines. It covers a block 200 by 200 feet in size, is 100 feet in height at the highest point, and is built of reinforced concrete and cream-colored brick with terra cotta trimmings. The main entrance on Third Street has seven double metal doors at the head of granite steps 120 feet in length extending up from the sidewalk.

Interior.—The interior of the main auditorium is in white, of plain design and free from columns or pillars to obstruct the view. The proscenium arch, 50 feet in width and 31 feet in height, is of an artistic scroll design which is carried out around the balcony rail. Interior lighting is from five main suspended fixtures supplemented by numerous cluster lights. Two large assembly halls with polished maple floors are separated from the main auditorium by sliding partitions which may be removed in fifteen minutes' time, thus throwing these spaces into the main body of the house. These rooms are provided with portable chairs and heavy canvas covering for the floor, which is used for dancing and banquets. Entrance to the upper floors and balconies is by way of wide stairways. Entrance to the main floor is through the Third Street doors, which open into a ticket lobby entirely of marble, 15 by 106 feet in size, with ticket windows at each end. This lobby is connected with a foyer 12 by 140 feet in size, separated from the main auditorium by glass doors. The building has separate entrances for the upper floors and for the assembly rooms, making these available for use while the main auditorium is being used. Each floor is provided with adequate comfort stations and with check-rooms. A main rest-room for ladies and a smoking-room for men are on the main floor at each end of the foyer.

Acoustics.—The auditorium has perfect acoustics throughout, the softest music being heard distinctly in the most remote seats. An ordinary voice carries to every part of the building and the words may be heard distinctly. When the side assembly-rooms are seated, music or a speaker may be heard distinctly in the farthest corner.

Seating.—The main floor has 1,590 seats in four sections of thirty-two rows, with twelve and thirteen seats to the row. The first row in front of the stage is six feet lower than the last row in the back of the house. In the balconies each row of seats is nine inches higher than the row in front. All seats are the standard leather-padded opera chair type, numbered by seat, row and section.

Balconies.—Two balconies extend the full length of the main floor on three sides, running from over the outer edge of the seats on the main floor to the outer walls of the building. The balconies are separated by a wide aisle and rail and are entered from stairways leading up from the foyer. The balconies are entirely separate, there being no entrance from one balcony to the other except by way of the main outside stairway. The topmost seats in the second or upper balcony are 150 feet from the stage.

Stage.—The building is equipped with a stage 84 feet in width and 49 feet in depth ,with fly gallery 34 feet above the stage, 88-foot rigging loft and 56 feet between fly gallery and floors, proscenium opening 50 feet wide and 31 feet high. The stage is equipped with asbestos and front curtain, picture screen, draperies, wings, drops, 138 sets of lines, footlights, border lights, floor pockets, the latest type Cutler-Hammer dimmers controlling both stage and house lights, both direct and alternating electric supply, removable sectional floor, twenty dressing-rooms capable of accommodating 1,500 persons, freight elevator to all floors, parallels, platforms, stage extensions, flood lights, calciums, lamp-room with two motion picture machines, spotlights, stereopticon, orchestra pit 8 by 50 feet, with a capacity of sixty pieces, with understage entrances, property-rooms, large assembly-rooms adjoining stage, and carpenter, blacksmith and general repair shops. The under stage is 12 feet in height and the full size of the stage. The building is flood-lighted from the front.

Pipe Organ.—The auditorium is equipped with the latest type Skinner pipe organ, installed in 1917 at a cost of $25,000. It is pronounced by organ experts one of the best organs in the United States. The console is portable and may be used either in the orchestra pit or on the stage. The organ is used at all public functions.

Basement and Baths.—Two large comfort stations and public baths are installed on the Clay Street side of the building with entrances separate from those in the building proper. Beneath the lower floor of the main auditorium is a concrete basement 169 by 100 feet in size, with numerous small rooms for storage, etc. Entrance to the basement is through the main doors to the building or by other entrances connecting only with the basement. A wagon entrance 20 feet in width leads into the basement from the street.

Assembly Rooms.—Above the first or main floor are four large assembly-rooms, two of which are occupied by the exhibits of the Oregon Historical Society, while the others are used for small meetings and for temporary exhibits.

Kitchens.—A main kitchen completely equipped for large banquets has direct entrances to the basement and to the assembly or banquet hall on the south side of the building. Dumb-waiters facilitate service. A smaller kitchen serves the assembly-room on the north side of the building. The kitchen has modern gas ranges and cooking equipment and dishes and tables sufficient for about 2,000 plates.

Combination Affairs.—When the entire building is required for big events the main floor, side rooms and basement may be brought together by installing portable stairways in the orchestra pit, giving an eight-foot walk from the main floor to the basement. This plan is particularly desirable for large carnival events.

Protection.—The auditorium is provided with a thoroughly adequate system of exits from every section of both balconies, the main floor, side rooms, assemblies, stage and basement. All exits are of the "fire door" type, opening when pressed from the inside, and remaining locked from the outside. The building is also provided with an automatic sprinkler system and with automatic metal fire doors between main rooms.

WHAT IT MEANS TO THE NORTHWEST

By John D. Rice

DON'T say this caption is not explicit; the word "it" has only one meaning—the General Convention in Portland in 1922.

The letters of this big word—IF—tower, rose-entwined, a shimmer of color; bowed by clustered beauty drawn from Oregon air and soil, they stand apart and form an arch of welcome for the oncoming host. One year hence, hardly one of Time's pulse-beats, new discoverers of Oregon will be with us. What a burst of realization! Into the mighty West will they come, over steel-edged trails, past mountain pyramids, along deep-cut valley aisles, through miles of inspiration.

Really, it's hard to settle down to the subject in hand, which insists that we try to tell what the General Convention means to the Pacific Northwest. The stir of this wonderland jumbles our data; its garden fragrance drugs our fancies; its charm would lure us from the prosaic—anything to be up and away; gripping one of Oregon's wings; or drifting down the Columbia, to watch the shadows of the evening steal across the sky, the venerable peaks pull on their pink night-caps and the star gleam gild the majesty of the river.

What—what will it mean to the Pacific Northwest? Shall we say, economically—grewsome word! We know that a larger, finer system of measurement than this is needed. And so does every loyal Churchman and Churchwoman; here this favored area is abundantly blessed—men and women of truest spiritual temperament, who would be ashamed to leave undone their best for the convention. And shoulder to shoulder with them are leaders in metropolis and throughout the Commonwealth; keen-eyed, indomitable, fired with purpose that looks beyond golden materiality, new-rising emporiums of marble or even a growing population and domains of falling forest and turned-up sod. With us they are thinking, to be sure, of the prosperity and happiness of the people in this magnificent Northwest, but far more of its devotion to the refining ideals of righteousness.

Moreover, there are a few things for us to consider. This Pacific Northwest did not spring up fully developed and glorious like a pyrotechnic device shot skyward and curving into color shapes. In its making we see also figures odd and strange to modernity. A sail appears on the Columbia. Canoes with muffled oars essay its tributaries, slipping into a wilderness overhung with mystery. Bristling, fur-clad explorers follow the river to its confluence with the sea. A keen-eyed native sights their approach; startled, he is metamorphosed into stone, his gaze still held by what he sees in the distance. Settlers trickle in. Clumsy oxen draw their shrouded wagons. Ruddy campfire reflections slash the bosom of stygian stream. A thousand miles from civilization, buried in savage solitudes, these home-seekershuddle close and lift up their hearts to God who watches over them.

And then they come—the pioneer missionaries, the mightiest hewers, the stoutest builders to labor in the making of this Pacific Northwest; aiding its settlement, giving it a soul; bringing the white man's Book of heaven, the Church and eternal life to the Indians; making and consolidating new gains for Christ; founding the great educational institutions of Oregon. Here they wrought, spending and being spent; lights shining in a wilderness of darkness; heaviness they endured for a night that joy might come in the later generation morning.

How proud we are to glimpse among them, Bishop Scott, St. Michael Fackler, William Richmond and other heroes of the faith who brought the Church to old-time Oregon. Time glorifies them; tradition glows with their names and deeds. We who today are stepping into a greater future may well look back, our hearts overflowing, to those who helped to bulwark Oregon for Christ—Bishop, clergy and laity. And we cannot forget the later heroes in the strife—Bishop Morris, Bishop Barker, Bishop Scadding, the clergy and the sons and daughters of the Church who were choice vessels of grace and lights of the world in their several generations. They are with us in spirit.

But why this long, searching gaze into the past. The reason ought to be very evident. The Pacific Northwest is young in point of development. Our elder sister States to the East may be justified by kindly intent in smiling indulgently and patting us on the head. We are patient; for we know where we happen to be. Oregon, Washington and Idaho are quite mature. They have been out in the world for some time, hustling for themselves and making their own living. Even so, our elder sisters may think us precocious; but that is not the point!

No—there is one great fact that leaps out, sharp and clear. It is the real basis of this sketch; every foregoing word is pertinent to it; in it people of every faith may well rejoice.

What a mighty testimonial is it to the efficacy of seventy-eight years of religious endeavor in this Northwest that a conservative institution like the Episcopal Church in the United States of America, powerful out of all proportion to its million communicants and part of the great Anglican Communion of thirty million members, should elect to hold its Triennial Convention in Portland! This not mere boasting. Cities that were great when Oregon was merely a name and Portland unborn, and now in the million class, would have welcomed the honor. The beauties and grandeurs of our western land would have won us kindly consideration. But the General Convention of the American Church does not follow tourist guide-book routes; scenery alone couldn't draw it. What brought the General Convention to Portland was thoroughly attested social and religious culture of this progressive Northwest, home of unlimited potentialities; it is the crowning glory of seventy-eight years of religious enterprise. Judge now what the convention means to the Pacific Northwest. What systems of measurement, what forms of evaluation will you use?

How they must rejoice—we feel that they do—our spiritual kinsmen in the cloud of witnesses! Our own heroes of the faith, sturdy empire and kingdom builders! Yes, and all the others—Jason Lee, Marcus Whitman, Dr. Parker, Father Blanchet, and other men of might who raised the cross to the gilding rays of the sun of the Pacific! It's a far cry from the early missionaries to the magnificence of our triennial conclave. Yet what man has wrought and what God has wrought meet here on a wonder page of history. We thank God for it all.

Now we look forward to September, 1922, not wasting time in rapture-gazing; but vision-blest, we lay hold of our preparation tasks, grateful that they are ours to perform. Happy heart-throbs enter into the welcome we plan for our guests. We like to think of the delightful amazement of those who will come to discover this West where every prospect pleases—a sublime background to all of our industrial, social, intellectual and religious development. They will understand the spirit that has built up here a newer East. They will marvel at the wealth of opportunity, and returning home, will be westward looking. Through them thousands, who know not our favored Northwest, will be filled with enthusiasm for the World's Fair in 1925 and will come flocking hither. There is, indeed, a logical interaction between the religious and the social and economic—Oregon's experience proves that—and whatever prosperity and other advantage may come to secular interests in this region we wish with all our heart.

We are confident that Oregon hospitality will meet every expectation of our guests; that its doors will fly open to the fainest tug at the latch-string. Most Reverent Presiding Bishop, worthy leader and father of your people, honored by a nation, loved by your children of the Church, your message stirs our hearts. It gives us strength for our task and puts joy into it. We will not disappoint you. Governor and Mayor, we thank you for your characterful, cordial words of greeting. They exemplify the Oregon spirit—its snap, its dash and its sparkle, and its captivating goodwill—and will travel over the land. Church people and fellow-citizens co-operating, God has blessed us with a wonderful opportunity in bringing this convention within our gates. Your duty is a proud one.

The years still in the curtained future will tell what the General Convention means to the Pacific Northwest. But in the meantime our resplendent opportunity is at hand.

Clerical Fallacies

Two fallacies seem to be creeping into the current life of the ministry. The one is that there is any objective which is a substitute for the direct love of souls, whether that direction be through the ordinary pastoral round of the congregation, or through educational, social or administrative channels. In being fishers of men there is ever the temptation spoken of by Habakkuk to "sacrifice unto their net and burn the incense unto their fine net." Nothing gets a man away from his people or from the inspirations of his ministry sooner than to allow himself to rest in any avocation of secondary concerns of the Church away from the vowed vocation to help the piety of the people. No avocations, however many or however telling, can add up in themselves to amount to that pristine vocation. No busy stir in committees or Church machinery can in itself restore the priestly glow when that is denatured in a loss of first love of souls. It was said of Bishop Phillips Brooks, with the multitudinous outside Church and civic calls made upon him, and his unique pulpit record, "His ministry was a pastorate rather than a rectorate. He cared for each one, even the littlest and most humble of his flock. It was thus that his great heart found responsive love and full recognition in other hearts." And there is no Petrine question of anything like as much moment to the modern catholicity of the Church's meaning of its age as that critical charge for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, the ruling of the Spirit in love and the profiting of His Church—"Feed My sheep," "Feed My lambs."

The other fallacy that sometimes works with this bane of avocation is the itch for notoriety. There must be of course wholesome publicity. Perhaps our Church tradition has not made the use of it it might. It may have been more concerned to see that the true light of its candle burned and was not snuffed out, than with the candlestick for its shining abroad. No doubt the provision for letting that light duly shine by our general and local Departments of Publicity is both timely and progressive. What has to be resisted in its beginnings, however, in these times of limelighting everything, is the feeling that sometimes comes over one, as he reads glowing accounts of what this one or that one is accomplishing in his field, that somehow what he is doing in his humble, faithful round, when he is calling his sheep by name and trying inconspicuously to lead them to better things, does not amount to much. Ought he not to have more notoriety? In nine cases out of ten, if he is the good shepherd of his flock, he in the long run has more appreciation and recognition of the right sort than he suspects. But the temptation to restlessness is just there to be resisted. If it is yielded to, then come discontent and the effort to get more "in the Sun" of position or popularity. Then "the sheep of Christ, which He bought with His death, and for whom He shed His blood," are in the very peril of finding a hireling shepherd, and the ministry begins to move in the direction of easiest, not to say egotist, direction. One who probably did more than any thinker to change the whole attitude of early New England "pastoring" for the piety of children, Dr. Horace Bushnell, in his "Christian Nurture" said of himself towards the end of his life, "I was almost never a president or vice-president of any society and almost never on a committee. Take the report of my doings on the platform of the world's business, and it is naught. I have filled no place at all." That is bound to stand as a most suggestive perspective of vocational power for the ministry of this or any generation.—Bishop Nichols' Convention Address.

New Ground

The Rev. George W. Lay, D. C. L.

WE would call attention to the need that exists for work among three classes that are not ordinarily reached by the Church Sunday school.

I. Home Religion. The religious training of infants and of children too young to attend school is of the utmost importance. Nothing can take its place. Good habits and ideas are then most easily acquired and bad ones are eradicated later with great difficulty. This work must be done by the parents, who too often fail from ignorance, indifference or diffidence. The parents need instruction, inspiration and encouragement. Two main things must be done. Individually, each child must be told Bible stories and taught the simple things of religion as soon as he can listen, and must begin to say his own little prayer, night and morning, as soon as he can lisp. Collectively, an atmosphere of religion in the home must be created, especially by grace at each meal and by family prayers, where all join and each child takes some part. The influence of these early habits and associations will never fade. This work must be promoted in each parish by the rector and his lay assistants, but dioceses and provinces can suggest methods and furnish printed matter. The best work in this line has been done by the Committee on Home Nurture in Religion of the Second Province, Rev. T. A. Conover, Bernardsville, N. J., Secretary. Its 1917 report is practically out of print, but a further report will probably be available soon.

II. The Home Department. Under this name a good deal of work has already been done by many religious bodies. It is a department of the Sunday school, but its work is outside in providing instruction for both young and old who desire it. The teachers may, or may not, be on the regular Sunday school staff. The students have lesson books or papers and do the work at home. The teachers may go weekly to each student at his home, or the written papers with the week's work may be sent to the teacher, corrected and returned. This latter method is most useful, especially for adults, in a scattered country parish. Each student is enrolled, makes a weekly offering in an envelope provided for the purpose, and receives a letter from the rector or superintendent at stated times. Occasionally most of them can attend a special session at the parish church.

III. The Sunday School by Post. Thousands of isolated communicants and would-be students are scattered about the country, neglected, forgotten and lost. This is practically an untried field with us and deserves careful attention and development. The General Board of Religious Education of the Church of England in Canada, 133 Confederation Building, Toronto, conducts a Sunday school by post in connection with its Home Department. Their experience will help us. Each student is assigned to a particular teacher and all is done by correspondence. Thus even a "shut-in" may be either scholar or teacher. Each Diocese should have a committee to seek and find these neglected and hungry souls and provide for their pastoral care and religious instruction.

WHAT DO YOU THINK OF THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN?

Some Answers Received in the Prize Competition for Suggestions

We want to know what our readers are thinking about the Southern Churchman. We want to know what they like and do not like in its pages. We want the fresh suggestion of their ideas to make plain to us the paths of larger development.

Therefore, we are asking all our readers to send us their opinions on three questions about the paper; and, in order to indicate the real value which we attach to their answers, the Southern Churchman offers prizes for the best, the second best and the third best suggestions which shall be sent us—twenty-five dollars, fifteen dollars and ten dollars respectively.

The questions are these:

1. What feature of the Southern Churchman do you like best, and why?
2. What feature of the Southern Churchman do you like least, and why?
3. What feature not now contained in the Southern Churchman would you most like to see added?

There are no restrictions upon this invitation, nor upon eligibility for the prizes. The lists are open to subscribers and non-subscribers alike, but of course those who are regular readers of the paper will be in the best position to give helpful answers. The only conditions are these:

That the answer to any one question be not more than one hundred and fifty words.

That all answers be written on only one side of the paper.

That preferably they shall be typewritten, or if this is not practicable, that they be written by hand very plainly.

The invitation is open for the months of November and December, closing December 31. From time to time we may print some of the answers received. Prizes will be awarded to the most helpful answers as soon as possible after January 1.

Here Are Some of the Answers

I. The feature of the Southern Churchman that appeals most strongly to me is "Christianity and the Community," edited by Rev. R. Cary Montague, because it is always practical and can be easily understood by the common or garden variety of layman. In this department there is an absence of glittering generalities, but instead some specific abuse to be corrected, or some definite charity to be supported.

I like this department because Mr. Montague is never neutral, he calls a spade a spade, and is not afraid to speak his mind concerning such important issues as the League of Nations, prohibition, racial injustice and the unfair administration of criminal law.

2. The feature I like least in the Southern Churchman is the Department for Young Folks. I notice that each of my own youngsters is quite willing to let the other fellow have first go at the Southern Churchman, while this Alphonse-Gaston politeness is conspicuous by its absence upon the arrival of a Sunday paper containing a comic supplement. Far be it from me to say one word in extenuation of the horrors of the funny paper. To my mind the Katzenjammer kids are detestable, but only slightly more so than the pallid heroes of the Rollo books, and there have been times when some of the selections in your Young Folks' Department were painfully suggestive of Rollo.

I realize that this department is by far the hardest to provide for, and my suggestion is that your next betterment contest be devoted to the question of how best to secure and retain the interest of young people in a Church paper.

3. The feature that I would like most to see added to the Southern Churchman would be a column devoted to the answering of questions pertaining to the Church—its history, its geography, its law and general statistics. This department might well be called "The Historiographer's Easy Chair." Or, if that title would be too palpable, a steal from another excellent weekly, we might just head the column, "Ask the Southern Churchman." This would soon become the oracle for Sunday school teachers, vestrymen and all Church workers, including hundreds of ministers who have not access to a complete reference library.

J. C. M. Valentine.

Responding to your request for readers' opinions of "Southern Churchman," permit me to say that, generally speaking, I consider it without a superior among religious family papers. It appeals to all, and furnishes excellent reading matter for the group around the fireside. It does not forget the children. To the seeker after Church news and current opinion, it is truly satisfying.

1. The department "For the Young Folks" is my favorite, because the children delight in it and await it eagerly.

2. The department, "Christianity and the Community," alas, falls far short of its splendid opportunity, and therefore must be voted as the least satisfactory. The trouble is, it lacks vision. It assumes that a Christian's whole duty is to pray and patch. Consistent with this view in the November 5 issue, your editor waxes eloquent over the prospective gifts of cast-off clothing. Imagine what a motley junk-heap would confront some "generous" Christians on the day of judgment if the promise were literally fulfilled: "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord; and look, what he layeth out, it shall be paid him again."

When will the Church's spokesmen heed the self-respecting cry of the honest poor: "We want work, not charity."

The longest paragraph on this page (13) is devoted to the puerile performance of giving a grotesquely trimmed poke bonnet to a dear little girl, one of three small children whose mother is a delicate widow, with no means of support. How many generous Christians were "among those present at the presentation" we are not told, but we doubt whether the Lord Jesus was present at such a travesty of sweet charity. And yet, that is the puny way in which some professing Christians would solve the awful problem of five million unemployed in the United States.

3. Mr. Editor, you do not need any more departments. What you do need is a new life in the Department of Social Service. It needs raising from the death of sin (of omission) to the life of justice. Its editor ought to read the soul-stirring gospel of Jesus Christ, and teach His uprooting message. Such a brave venture would, of course, offend the Scribes and Pharisees, and the cry would be raised anew, "Crucify Him." But unflinchingly persisted in, this policy would cause such a resurrection of dry bones that the Southern Churchman would forge to the front among the real heralds of the kingdom.

James L. Smiley.

To the Southern Churchman.

Now tell me, pray, how can I say
  Which feature is the best,
When all is fine, in every line,
  I study in my quest?

Religious news and various views
  On questions of the day,
With learning fraught give food for thought
  Inspiring mental play.

The family, too, now comes in view
  With reading for the young;
With stories true, both old and new,
  For e'en the prattling tongue.

So how can I, much as I try,
  Say which appears the best?
I'll seek no more upon this score
  And so resign my quest.

Mary P. Bryan.

1. I love the Southern Churchman as a valued, life-long friend; but perhaps what I best like about it is that it is so fearlessly loyal to its splendid motto: "Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man."

A favorite feature with me is "Thoughts for the Thoughtful."

2. The Children's Department might be improved. They must learn to love the Southern Churchman.

3. Would it be possible to introduce a short course of religious instruction for children—if only a few questions to which they may look up answers. Alice B. Joynes.

---

1. I like best the Family Department. Why? Because I know of no other Church paper that equals the Southern Churchman in this respect.

I remember as a child how eagerly I looked for it, and the love of a paper gained in childhood usually lasts through life.

2. I cannot think of any feature of the Southern Churchman that I like least.

3. I should like to see a more comprehensive survey of the whole field of the Church at home and abroad. Why? I have the impression that the Southern Churchman is thought of more as a local or Diocesan paper than its colleagues, The Churchman and The Living Church.

Mary Packard.

1. The news from the several Dioceses and the General Church, as that keeps us in touch with missionary work all over the world.

2. It is not a teaching paper. Too much preaching and too little putting forth the real living doctrines of God's Body on earth.

3. Give us wholesome articles for the young, instead of pointless stories. Nobody objects to tales told with an intention to teach.

Margaret Stanley Beckwith.

1. The beautiful Collect each week, for our uplift, and the aim and clearness of the paper, also its high tone and get up, etc., etc., for it's far above any Church publication I have ever read.

2. Too many advertisements spoil the sacredness in bringing before the reader the secular things of this world (the Christ first and last), from end to end.

3. Put in each week a good gospel sermon for the benefit of those readers who can't get out to hear them.

The Church and Law Enforcement

The Rev. G. W. Gasque.

Should the Church be actively interested in law enforcement?

Seventy-five years before the exile Isaiah described the condition of Judah in these words: "From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it, but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores." Just a short time before the nation was taken into captivity Jeremiah summed up the whole situation by saying, "Thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God."

In this same connection the prophet explains one of the principal causes of the disintegration of Judah. The public servants of God and of the people had failed in their duty. There were four classes of officials: (1) Priests; (2) they that handle the law; (3) pastors; (4) prophets (Jere. 2:8).

Concerning legal matters in Jeremiah's day, "they that handled the law" knew not God. These men who handled the law were inseparably connected with the priests, the pastors and the prophets. Their office was a sacred one, just as the offices of the other men were sacred. They were regarded as servants of God, just as the other men were servants of God. And they, together with other public officials, together with other servants of God, failed. Because they failed the nation went under. Judah was taken into captivity, from which she never recovered.

The same idea of the sacredness of office is brought out by the Apostle Paul in Rom. 13:1-7. Paul tells us clearly and emphatically that the powers that be are ordained of God, and that rulers, they that are in authority, they that "handle the law," are "ministers of God."

When you come to call a clergyman to be the minister of your church, or to elect or appoint other church officers, you secure men who are known for their piety, education, and general fitness for the position.

When you meet on election day to call a man to be Governor, or Attorney General, or Chief of Police, or any other man in authority or who may have to do with handling the law, if you follow the teachings of the Bible and the Church, you will be equally careful to select men who are straight and clean and honest religiously, and men who are otherwise capable of filling the place.

It is a Christian duty and obligation. And the community that fails in this regard must suffer.

If they that handle the law know not God, as they usually do not, laws will be ignored. Political graft and corruption will continue just as it has in the past. You cannot expect your public funds to be correctly appropriated. If the men in authority are unchristian and incapable, nothing but prostitution of the law can be the result.

The only solution of the problem is a Biblical and religious solution. As ministers and Christian men and women we must come to realize that we are citizens, and that our citizenship is sacred, and cannot be separated from our religion.

A little while ago Mr. John A. Boykin, Attorney General of Fulton County, Ga., in the "Christian Index," made an appeal to the Church people of the country to help enforce the law. He said that "laws cannot be enforced without an aroused moral sentiment behind them."

He continued: "We need in this period of utter lawlessness a rebirth of respect for the law. The Church is the moral force that must restore this respect for the law. When we fully realize how much law means to the individual and to civilization itself, and when we come to look upon law as the great Clarendon did, as the standard and guardian of liberty, then indeed will we have that rebirth of respect for law that we now so sorely need."

Public sentiment is necessary for certain things, for the enactment of a law for example. But when a law is enacted as a result of an aroused public sentiment, as the law of prohibition for example, when the law was passed, public sentiment did not die. There is as much public sentiment in favor of prohibition today, if not more, than there ever was.

Public sentiment, however, will not enforce law. Laws are enforced by those in authority, by the men who are elected to enforce them. Laws will be enforced only when the men in authority are honest and capable. By honesty I mean men who are straight, clean, Christian gentlemen. By capable men I mean men who possess initiative, leadership and education.

The best, quickest, most effective way Church people can aid officials like Mr. Boykin in the enforcement of law will be to realize the sacredness and responsibility of our citizenship, and elect to office only honest and capable men who realize the sacredness of their office, just as we would exercise care and judgment in the selection of a minister of the church.

We have all the sentiment that we need for law enforcement. What we need is an aroused sense of the sacredness and responsibility of citizenship, and then to exercise our citizenship and not turn it over to professional politicians. You would not turn over to corrupt politicians the management of your church. Apply the same rule to the management of your civic affairs. Do not call one religious and the other secular. All power is of God. And the men in civic authority as well as the men in religious authority are "ministers of God."

Army and Navy Commission Honors Unknown Soldier

On Thursday, November 10, the Bishop of Washington delegated Bishop Perry, of Rhode Island; Dean Bratenahl, of the Army and Navy Commission, and Dean Washburn, of the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge, to lay a wreath in the name of the Church on the casket of the unknown soldier. The delegates were met at the foot of the Capitol steps by an officer of the United States Army, and were conducted through the corridors of the Senate to the rotunda. They then advanced into the middle of the rotunda and stood by the side of the casket. While Bishop Perry placed the wreath on the catafalque, he said the words that follow:

"The Army and Navy Commission of the Episcopal Church offers to the unknown soldier and to those who like him laid down their lives for home and for country this tribute of grateful and sacred remembrance. With it we place the Church War Cross inscribed with the words, 'Christ died for thee,' conferred upon many of his comrades as a token and sign of their faith and devotion.

"Almighty God, we yield unto Thee high praise and hearty thanks for those Thy servants, who in the defense of liberty and justice have laid down their lives for their country. Grant that they, faithful unto death, may receive the crown of everlasting life, and that the good work which Thou hast begun in them shall be performed until the day of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

"The Lord bless thee and keep thee. The Lord make His face to shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee and give thee peace, both now and evermore. Amen."

During this brief service a constant stream of men, women and children was passing through the rotunda to pay their last tribute of respect to the unknown soldier and those whom he represented.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

THE TIDE HAS TURNED.

There is certainly a rise and fall in the great surge of human affairs that is almost as regular as that of our oceans. Who knows? Perhaps God in His wisdom so adjusted His laws that we might observe and learn from the rythmic motive of those mighty bodies of water something of the way in which human sentiment would rise and fall, and so take advantage of the crest of the wave to try to make permanent the advantages gained, and to wait with courage and patient faith when altruism and spirituality seem to have sunk to a low ebb.

As we look back over the past few years we see this condition in world affairs very wonderfully exemplified.

In October, 1918, the desire to serve, to sacrifice, to give for others was at its height. The boys in France were daily laying down their lives for a great cause, the vision of a war to end war was bright before them.

Here at home we felt that there was nothing too arduous or too menial for us to do so long as it could be called service for others.

Then the "flu" epidemic swept the world; those of us who had been compelled to stay at home by reason of physical defects or family obligations grasped eagerly at the opportunity to be helpful and useful.

School buildings were turned into hospitals. People of every walk of life volunteered as cooks, nurses, waitresses, orderlies.

The wife of the Governor of one of our Southern States served as a ward nurse in a hospital for negro patients, reversing the ordinary relationships of life.

The writer of this page worked as an orderly in an emergency hospital (and gloried in it), his companion and fellow-orderly being a small negro boy. One day, when I came in from lunch and was putting on my apron, this small black fellow-worker looked at me patronizingly and remarked: "If all of 'em was as reg'lar as we is, they wouldn't have so much trouble roun' this here hospital."

It was a mede of praise that will never be forgotten.

Yes, in those days the ideals of Christian Social Service came nearer to be universally fulfilled than ever before.

Then came the armistice, and the Paris Peace Conference. The tide began to ebb, selfishness, jealousy, fear and hatred began to rise to the surface from the depths to which they had sunk. This jealousy was not confined to the feeling between nations. It penetrated within the ranks of national leadership. It submerged one after another of those who had guided their countries to success.

Orlando, Clemenceau, Wilson and Venezelos successively went down under it.

The League of Nations was thrown into the turmoil of party politics in this country, and was finally repudiated at the polls. In the heat of controversy and partizanship mistakes were made on both sides, and as a result it looked at one time as though all the wealth had been spent in the great war in vain, as though the blood and treasure had been wasted to no purpose.

Not so. It was only the ebbing of the tide.

We may be pardoned for reminding our readers that in November last year (just after the election), we advocated a day of prayer for world peace, and a writing of letters to United States Senators to urge the setting in motion of some plan to bring about the hastening of the motto of tthis page (Thy kingdom come on earth) through some form of international agreement.

At that time we tried to get a resolution looking to this end (a day of prayer for peace) adopted at the Synod of the Fourth Province, then in session at Norfolk, but it is difficult to arouse faith in prayer even among clergymen.

However, the power and prestige of the Federal Council of Churches brought about that day of prayer, and of letter-writing to Senators, and now the tide has turned!

England has ordered the cessation of work on four great battleships, which will save to the government one hundred and sixty million dollars, a sum equal to the entire revenue of the United States in 1860.

There are strong indications that a more Christian attitude will be adopted by the nations toward China, and altogether the outlook is more wonderfully hopeful than the most sanguine could have predicted.

Surely no one can deny that our prayers have been in vain. Let us keep them up with faith. Let our preachers continue to exert all their influence to mould public opinion and to make it articulate through letters and memorials to the President, and especially let us remember that there will be a final stage of these proceedings when both prayers and pressure will be especially needful.

Undoubtedly some of the decisions arrived at will have to receive the sanction of the United States Senate, perhaps some legislative action by the House of Representatives may be necessary. Let Christian people be alert and stand ready to respond promptly and with unanimity to any call that may come for concerted action from the Federal Council of Churches. Let us be prepared to deluge Congress with letters if necessary.

The peace of the world is a vision, an attainment that is big enough and Christian enough to submerge all differences and deserves the utmost efforts of people of all religions.

ANOTHER NEW ERA OPENING?

We are surely living in great times. The following news dispatch from Chicago may mark the opening of a new epoch in industrial relations:

"(Associated Press).—Employees of Armour & Co., 26,000 in all, today, through their Plant Governing Committee, agreed with officials of the packing house that a wage reduction is necessary, and fixed its amount. The cut is effective November 28.

This is the first time in the history of the industry that a wage reduction has been arrived at in such a manner.

Tonight officials of Swift & Co. announced that after an all-day conference the representatives of the Chicago assembly of employees had voted that a readjustment of wages was necessary, had extended a vote of confidence in the management, and had voted to leave the wage readjustment to the direction of the management.

Reductions for various classes of employees of the Chicago assembly practically corresponding to those fixed by the employees of Armour & Co., and effective on the same date, November 28, were then announced by company officials, who said they expected the other sixteen assemblies of employees to take similar action.

Employees of Wilson & Co. and the Cudahy Packing Company, who are holding plant conferences, are expected to accept similar reductions, and Morris & Co. has announced that it will follow the example of the others. All of the big five except Morris & Co. last spring inaugurated the 'plant congress' system of employees' participation in the management of the industry.

The agreement between Armour & Co. and its employees followed a two-day conference. Twenty-four employees, representative of the plant councils in nine cities, met with an equal number of company officials. The books were opened and the financial situation of the company explained. The question was put to a vote and reductions, effective in all plants except that at Fort Worth, Tex., adopted.

The reductions apply to plants in Chicago, St. Paul, Sioux City, Omaha, St. Joseph, Kansas City, St. Louis and Denver.

The reductions at Fort Worth, where wages are gauged by local labor conditions, are:

Unskilled labor receiving less than 42½ cents an hour, 7½ cents; semi-skilled labor receiving from 42½ to 47½ cents an hour, 5 cents; skilled labor receiving more than 47 cents an hour, 3 cents.

When the reductions are applied to the plants of the other members of the 'Big Five,' 125,000 men and women will be affected. In the final result a far larger number will be directly concerned, as wages in several hundred smaller packing houses are based on the 'Big Five' scales.

No change is made in working conditions or the forty-hour week guarantee.

Church Service League of the Province of Sewanee

What is believed will be a contribution to the Church was the successful meeting of the Church Service League of the Province of Sewanee, held in Savannah, Ga., at the time of the Synod, October 25-27. The program, as arranged by the Provincial Council, and approved by the heads of the Provincial organizations, was carried out in full, and the demonstration of what the Church Service League is, and the inspiration gained from having the whole delegation meet together, made the meeting extremely interesting and profitable. About sixty women attended the meeting as delegates, including representatives from the Woman's Auxiliary, the Daughters of the King, the Girls' Friendly Society and the Church Periodical Club, as well as from Diocesan branches of the Church Service League, of which there are nine in the Province. Miss Nannie Hite Winston, of Kentucky, chairman of the Provincial Branch, presided, and led the experiment through to a successful conclusion. The general business of the League and the inspiration addresses were given before the combined group of women, and each of the four provincial organizations held its own business session before the whole delegation, presided over by its own provincial president. A half hour was allowed each organization to meet separately the first afternoon to elect its provincial officers, before reassembling for the afternoon session of the whole body. Addresses of welcome were made at the opening session by the Bishop of Georgia, and Mrs. A. B. Hull, of Georgia, president of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Province, and the reply was given by Mrs. T. P. Noe, of South Carolina, provincial president of the Girls' Friendly Society. One of the features of the program was the address of Miss Grace Lindley, Executive Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, on "Leadership." Special emphasis was laid by Miss Lindley on the acceptance of the responsibility of leadership. Two conferences were led by Mrs. W. J. Loaring Clark, of Tennessee, one on "The Position of Women in the Church," and the other on "Parish Co-operation and Federation." The first brought forth spirited discussion, and resulted in the women of the Province of Sewanee going on record as voting down equal privileges in the legislative bodies of the Church by a vote of forty to twenty-five. Noon-day prayers were said by the Bishops Coadjutor of Tennessee and Mississippi, and the Bishop of East Carolina gave a meditation at the opening session the second day. Special addresses were made by Mrs. T. W. Bickett, of North Carolina, on "The United Thank Offering"; Miss Bertha Richards, of St. Augustine's School, North Carolina, on "The Church Service League Prayer Leaflet Quarterly"; the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, D. D., on "Christian Social Service"; the Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., on "The DuBose Memorial School, Monteagle, Tenn., and the Sewanee Training School for Workers"; Mrs. T. W. Bickett, on "The Inter-racial Commission"; Miss Elsie Morrell, on "The Church Mission of Help," and the Rev. James M. Maxon, of Tennessee, on the value of the Daughters of the King in his parish, the latter at the session of the Daughters of the King. The feature of the session of the Woman's Auxiliary was the report of Mrs. W. P. Cornell, of South Carolina, provincial chairman of the Emery Fund, who reported that she had cash in hand amounting to $8,229, and the apportionment for the Province was $5,950. A special committee brought in a report on the revision of the by-laws which before the meeting of the League were for the government of the Council only, and now pertain to the Provincial Church Service League. The women delegates had their Corporate Communion with the members of the Synod the first day, and were entertained both days at luncheon and at the reception Wednesday afternoon to the Bishop of Tennessee, President of the Presiding Bishop and Council and the Bishop of Kentucky, President of the Synod, given by the four parishes in Savannah. The election of officers of the Church Service League resulted in the re-election of the following: President, the Bishop of Kentucky; Chairman, Miss Nannie Hite Winston, of Kentucky; Vice-Chairman, Mrs. W. J. Loaring Clark, of Tennessee; Secretary, Mrs. Edward Warner, of Atlanta; Secretary, Mrs. James G. Staten, of East Carolina; members at large, Mrs. C. L. Pettigrew, of Atlanta; Mrs. A. G. Stern, of Louisiana, and Miss Edith D. Johnston, of Georgia. The League will hold its next meeting at the time of the Synod in 1923 in St. Paul's Parish, Chattanooga, Tenn.

The Synod of the Province of New York and New Jersey

The eighth annual session of the Synod of the Province was held at Garden City, L. I., with the opening service on Tuesday evening, November 15, and business sessions on the two following days. The Synod was organized in the Diocese of Long Island, and having met annually in one of the seven dioceses, began its second cycle in the Diocese of its organization.

At the opening service the Cathedral was more than full. After a beautiful service and the address of welcome by Bishop Burgess, addresses were made by Bishop Brent, President of the Synod, whose words were suggested by the meeting of the Peace Conference, and by Bishop Manning, whose special thought was the need of Church unity.

At the first business session Bishop Brent, who became by seniority the president upon the death of Bishop Burch, was elected President for the term of three years, and the Hon. William J. Tully was chosen Chairman of the House of Delegates. The bishops and the delegates met together at all of the sessions, with the Rev. Canon Duffield re-elected as the Secretary. An hour was given on the first day to the reports of the various departments of the work of women in the province, made by Mrs. S. V. B. Brewster, Secretary of the Church Service League. All of the organizations appeared to have been very active, making real progress during the year.

The Rev. C. S. Lewis presented the report of the Board of Religious Education, speaking particularly of week-day religious education. The Rev. E. H. Pearce presented the subject of Young People's Societies in the Church, making clear the great need of such organizations. The Rev. Dr. Burroughs presented the work of the Delancey Divinity School, asking that it might have a provincial status.

The report of the summer schools was full of interest, with an attendance shown of three hundred and eighty at Geneva and two hundred and fifty at Princeton; and the desire to give them an even greater place in the life of the province was expressed.

Bishop Burgess reported for the Committee on the Revision of the Prayer Book, and it was voted to ask the General Convention to hasten the consideration of the work, that it might be entirely completed in 1925.

The Rev. C. K. Gilbert reported for the Social Service Commission, and the importance of the work was fully recognized.

The fact that at present only persons of considerable means can afford to attend the General Convention was presented. It was voted to suggest to the dioceses that the expenses of lay delegates as well as the clergy be paid, in the hope that the General Convention may be a more representative body.

The opinion was strongly expressed that the province ought to keep a large and recognized place in the Church, but that to do so larger powers must be given, with the ability to relieve the General Convention of the long consideration of subordinate questions.

In a long and interesting discussion, in which Bishop Loyd, the Rev. Dr. Goodwin and Hon. William J. Tully presented the formal papers, recognition of the great accomplishment of the Nation-Wide Campaign was made, and entire loyalty to those who have it in charge was expressed. There were some useful criticisms of the cost of administration and publicity, but all that was said was in good spirit and profitable.

The various commissions of many kinds were filled, and Mr. William M. Baldwin was chosen again for membership in the council. Albany, in its turn, invited the Synod for the next annual meeting. The attendance from all the dioceses was large and continued to the close of the session at noon on Thursday.

The Diocesan Church Club made all in attendance at the Synod, their guests at a dinner on Wednesday evening where addresses were made by the Bishop of the Diocese, Bishop Gailor, Judge Jenks and Judge Crane. A great many women representing their own forms of work were present at the Synod. The hospitality for all who came was abundant, and it was felt by all to have been a useful meeting of the Provincial Synod.

Church Intelligence

New York's First Diocesan Conference a Great Success

The Church Club of New York added another success in making it possible to hold in Carnegie Hall on November 18 a Diocesan Conference, the first but not the last to be planned. Far more people wanted to attend than the hall would hold. More than one thousand choristers alone volunteered where only two hundred could be used. Bishop Manning presided, and all other speakers were laymen. The features, all notable, of the Conference were the following:

1. Bishop Manning announced that, so far as he could learn, all partisanship in the Diocese has vanished. He said unity prevails everywhere. Parties no longer exist.

2. The laymen and the laywomen are to come into their own. Many offer to serve, and all must do so. There is no reason why clergy should do both spiritual and material work. They have done so long enough, partly because laymen would not do, and partly because clergy were autocratic and jealous of lay activity. There is to be careful division of labor, spiritual and material, and the latter is to be performed by unordained men and women.

3. With $46,000 a year pledged to pay salaries of bishops, including suffragans and their secretaries, a sum never before dreamed of in any American Diocese, nobody is saying it cannot be afforded, or calling a halt. Instead, when the Conference heard the Bishop say that only $3,000,000 is needed for the Cathedral nave, and proposed that it be raised and the nave built, there was a round of applause. The Bishop said that is not the first task, however, and he mentioned $1,000,000 to endow the episcopate, yielding $50,000 to $60,000, there was more applause. The present Episcopal Fund has stood at $240,000 since 1914, until this year, when about $45,000 additional has been pledged.

4. It is going to be possible, by the same facilities by which New York and other cities heard President Harding at Arlington on Armistice Day, to equip the Cathedral, chapels, choir, sanctuary, nave, in such way that every person can hear perfectly all that is said and sung, no matter in how obscure part he or she may be, and all this at not large expense either to instal or to maintain, and without unsightly equipment of any kind. As the Bishop observed, this is some advance.

Bishop Lloyd led in the opening prayers, and Bishop-elect Shipman led in recital of the Creed. Hymns were of the stirring sort, and resolutions praising President Harding for calling the Washington Conference, and Secretary Hughes for striking out for results large and early, were adopted. The speakers were Messrs. Stephen Baker, the financier; R. Fulton Cutting, who leads in work for the poor, for laboring men, and for social service; Stephen M. Bayne, who has worked hard for the Nation-Wide Campaign, and Dr. John H. Finley, late Commissioner of Education of New York. Following Mr. Bayne's address, the Bishop committed Diocese and Conference unreservedly to the Nation-Wide Campaign, and that to the last ounce of enthusiasm.

In his formal address Bishop Manning enumerated the things just ahead to be done, and in doing so mentioned one after the other, praising the work of each of them, the City Mission Society and the large number of efficient Diocesan agencies already functioning. The tasks, the Nation-Wide Campaign among them, are:

Completion of the Episcopal Endowment Fund to $1,000,000, and so relieve assessments from all parishes and missions. To strengthen the rural work of the Diocese, especially the Bronx, Staten Island, and all struggling missions. To enlarge work for foreign born, for negroes and for students. Bishop Manning said that with two suffragans he intended to find time to keep in close touch with every parish and mission, not by proxy, but personally. He seeks a Diocesan Council, and looks forward when parishes may have the same. He wished there might be five Cathedral canons, experts in all lines, to be consulting engineers, so to speak, ready at all times to assist wherever needed.

Speaking of the Carnegie Hall meeting, and the fact that its 3,500 seats were not enough, he observed that the Church Club had jokingly said it might next time engage Madison Square Garden. The Bishop said he had a better suggestion. It is to complete the Cathedral nave, and use that for great demonstrations by the people. Concluding, he predicted success for the Washington Conference and wondered whether the Cathedral might not be completeed, as far as the nave at any rate, as a great thank offering of the people for the start made by the world on the road to permanent peace.

It is not extravagant to say that the Conference was the best meeting of its kind ever held in the Diocese. There was a distinct advance in the size and number of the aims laid down, in the definite program mapped out, and in the eagerness with which those present enteretained and looked forward to the sacrifices involved. And those present were the workers and givers, coming from many parishes, and pledging service.

C.

Unique Mission.

Messrs. E. C. Mercer and H. H. Hadley, Second, conducted a very successful mission in Christ Church, Poughkeepsie (Dr. Alexander G. Cummins, rector), beginning October 30 and ending November 6.

Large congregations filled the church from the first to the last service of the mission. Even Saturday night, considered a good night to avoid by those holding missions, disclosed no diminution of interest, and a large congregation greeted the speaker.

The impressive success of the mission was due not only to a thorough preparation for it by the parish and its workers, but also to the co-operation of the Evangelical Churches of the city, the Y. M. C. A., and the Y. W. C. A. The ministers and leaders attended faithfully. During the week the Rev. Dr. J. Addison Jones, pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church, conducted the devotional service on Monday evening; the Rev. Francis S. Smithers, Jr., rector of St. Paul's Church, was in charge on Tuesday evening; the Y. M. C. A. on Wednesday evening; the Rev. James J. Henry, pastor of Trinity Methodist Church, led the service Thursday evening, several churches giving up their prayer meetings to attend. On Friday evening (a service for women) the Y. W. C. A. was in charge, and the devotional service was conducted by the women. The church was crowded in spite of the heavy rain-storm. On Saturday evening the Rev. John McNab, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, was in charge.

Messrs. Mercer and Hadley have an unusual message, and the fact that they are both laymen lends a special interest to their mission. The week-day night services were very simple—three hymns, a short Scripture lesson and the address. Splendid congregational singing, led by a presentor, was a feature of the mission. No choir was organized or used. The influence of this mission is being felt in all the Evangelical churches of Poughkeepsie.

Bible for the World Conference.

When the World Conference on the Limitation of Armaments opened its history making deliberations on Armistice Day, November 11, the Bible presented by the New York Bible Society was on the table, available for use.

President Harding had accepted the Bible in behalf of the Conference a fortnight or more before the session opened. It was presented to him by John C. West, President, and Dr. George William Carter, Executive Secretary of the New York Bible Society, by whom the Bible had been designed.

The New York Bible Society gave a Bible to every soldier and sailor who left New York ports during the war for France. Hundreds of thousands were distributed in this way. The society provides a Bible for every immigrant who comes into this country, and its work at Ellis Island has become famed around the world. The work is maintained by contributions from those who believe in its effectiveness. Sixty thousand dollars was used last year to "carry on."

The one hundred and twelfth anniversary of the society will be on Bible Sunday, December 4, at 8 o'clock in the St. Nicholas' Reformed Church, Fifth Avenue and Forty-eighth Street. Sir William Ramsay will deliver an address on "The Authority of the Bible."

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop

Death of the Rev. A. S. Johns.

The Rev. Arthur S. Johns, rector-emeritus of Christ Church, Washington Parish, Washington, died in Rockville, Md., on November 16, in the eighty-first year of his age. Mr. Johns was the youngest son of the late Bishop John Johns, of Virginia. He was a graduate of the Virginia Military Institute and the University of Virginia. He graduated at the Theological Seminary of Virginia in 1873 and was ordained deacon immediately after and priest the following year by his father.

He served in Hungars Parish, Northampton County, and Johns Parish, Loudoun County, Va., until 1878, and then in Prince George's Parish, Rockville, Md., until 1897, when he became rector of Christ Church, near the navy yard, in Washington. He labored here for more than twenty years until his health so failed a few years ago that he was compelled to retire. He served as the Secretary of the Diocese during the greater part of its history, and was a Deputy from his Diocese to four General Conventions. His wife, who was Miss Lane, of Fredericksburg, Va., a son, John Lane Johns, and a daughter, Rosalie V. D. Johns, survive him.

The American Loyalty Club has been organized for the first time in Washington, and had its first meeting recently in Epiphany Parish Hall under the direction of Dr. Freeman. This club had its origin in Dr. Freeman's former parish in Minneapolis, and since that time other chapters have been organized in other cities throughout the country. It stands for Christian and national ideals, with the cross the symbol of Christian faith and the flag the symbol of national faith. All young men interested are invited to become members.

Organ Recital: The sixty-fourth Sunday afternoon organ recital at the Washington Cathedral was given on Sunday, November 20, at 5 o'clock by Mr. Edgar Priest, Cathedral organist. These organ recitals are always largely attended, and are watched for by many of the Church people of the city. Mr. Priest's program on Sunday was well selected and rendered, and he was assisted by Mr. Ross Farrar, who sang a solo from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." These recitals are given on every third Sunday of the month at 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Removal of Church Headquarters: Washington Church people who like to think of the possibility of the removal of Church headquarters from New York to Washington will be particularly interested in comments made on the subject by Bishop Matthews, of New Jersey, at the meeting of the Synod of the Third Province in Wilmington, Del. "It is generally assumed," said Bishop Matthews, "that New York is Wall Street, and the cloud of Wall Street hangs over everything that is done there, and that one cannot come to New York without coming under the influence of Wall Street." He suggested that the prelate who would reside in Washington, be made an Archbishop, and that his choice should be by vote of the Episcopal Church as a whole.

M. M. W.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

In St. James' Church, Marietta, on November 13, the service and sermon were both in the interest of removing all provocations of war.

The same subject was dealt with in the session of the Sunday school, and in the evening the Young People's Service League had papers on the same subject.

The Sunday school and congregation sent to the chairman of the Conference for the Limitation of Armaments a resolution, heartily commending the effort that they are now making to rid the world of all cause for war; endorsing the program presented by the chairman of the conference; and assuring them of their prayers and encouragement.

Armistice Day Services: Beginning at 10:55, the church bell was tolled for three minutes; and then for four minutes there were memorial prayers for our soldiers who sacrificed their lives for their country, and for their dear ones who gave them and were left behind to grieve.

At 4 o'clock there were memorial prayers, and special prayers for God's guidance of the members of the Limitation of Arms Conference.

EAST CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Executive Council Holds Important Meeting.

The adoption of a proposed minimum program for the year 1922, and the decision to make an effective and thorough-going preparation for the annual canvass on November 20, were the main features of an important meeting of the Bishop and Executive Council of the Diocese of East Carolina, held in diocesan headquarters, Wilmington, November 3. A committee consisting of the Rev. William H. Milton and Mr. George B. Elliot, were appointed to make an estimate of the minimum needs of the Diocese. Their estimate, based upon the carefully ascertained needs of the five departments of the Church's work, reached a total of $82,641. Of this amount $27,341 is for the general Church quota.

The Executive Council took note of the fact that East Carolina is behind in her payment on the quota of the general Church, and provided for the prompt payment of this. The suggestion that the Diocese abandon diocesan projects until it has paid its full amount into the treasury of the general Church received warm support, but assurances from the clergy and laymen in the field appear to make this unnecessary. The resignation of the Rev. R. E. Gribbin as a member of the Executive Council was accepted with regret, as Mr. Gribbin leaves for another Diocese. The Rev. Stephen Gardner, of Washington, was elected to succeed him.

Convocation of Edenton: An address on "The Joy of Service," by the Ven. F. B. Drane, Archdeacon o the Yukon, featured the one hundred and seventy-ninth session of the Convocation of Edenton, which met with Christ Church, Creswell, November 8 and 9. Special emphasis was laid upon the missionary work of the Church at this meeting of Convocation. Sermons, addresses and lectures all bore evidence of the interest in missions which the Centennial observance has evoked. The Convocation listened with special interest to an address by Mr. S. S. Nash, of the Diocese of North Carolina, who has been the moving spirit in the establishment of a number of mission churches.

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Convocation held its meetings in the Methodist Church in Creswell, taking part with the men in the evening services. There was an unusually fine attendance of women, who are foremost in every good work. A number of invited speakers addressed the women. Mrs. Richard Williams, of Greenville, presided over the women's meetings.

Christ Church is located in an historic old parish, St. David's, and the tradition of loyalty and hospitality which it has enjoyed for many generations must be keenly appreciated by its people, for they gave lavish entertainment to the visiting delegates. An automobile trip to Lake Phelps was given on Tuesday afternoon. The old homes of the Pettigrews and Collins —names that signify much in the history of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese—were visited. The old St. David's Church, which was restored several years ago, was also visited. A reception was tendered the delegates following the Wednesday evening service.

The Rev. Alfred Taylor, of Hertford, is dean of the Edenton Convocation. The Rev. Theodore Partrick, Jr., is rector of St. David's Parish. Bishop Darst was present for most of the meetings, and made an address at the closing service, which inspired every one.

Correction: In the November 12th issue the Diocese of South Carolina was credited with the Rev. R. B. Drane, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Parish, Edenton, and with Ven. Frederick B. Drane, Archbishop of the Yukon. East Carolina is justly proud of the record of both father and son. Dr. Drane celebrates this year the forty-fifth anniversary of his rectorship of St. Paul's Parish. His long ministry has been marked by an uprightness of life and by an effectiveness of service seldom eequaled.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop's Fortieth Anniversary.

Plans are on foot for a rather elaborate celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the consecration of the Rt. Rev. Cortlandt Whitehead, S. T. D., as Bishop of Pittsburgh. The date is the Feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, January 25, 1922. The anniversary service will be held on the eve of the Feast, January 24, at Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, when there will be a festival service, with sermon by some clergyman of note. Following the service there will be a reception for Bishop and Mrs. Whitehead in the rectory of the church. Preceding this service there will take place on the 24th the annual meeting of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, at St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, which will include a commemoration of the event, the Bishop officiating at the celebration of the Holy Communion on that occasion. On the morning of the 25th the Bishop, clergy and prominent laymen and laywomen will proceed by special car to St. Paul's Church, Kittanning, for the consecration of the edifice that day. Luncheon will be served at the close of the service in the parish house. The visitors from Pittsburgh will return home from Kittanning in the late afternoon, and in the evening, at Calvary Church, the forty-seventh annual convention of the Diocese will convene.

Death of the Superintendent of St. Margaret's Hospital.

On Sunday, November 13, Miss Ora Frick, superintendent of the St. Margaret Memorial Hospital, Pittsburgh, passed away very suddenly in that institution of heart disease. Miss Frick was born in Philadelphia, and received her training as a nurse in Abbington Memorial Hospital, Philadelphia, of which she was superintendent for seven years. She had been superintendent of the St. Margaret Hospital only ten months, but her career there had been a very successful one. She was a member of the Graduate Nurses' Association of Pennsylvania, the Pittsburgh League for Nurses' Education, and the American Nurses' Association. Her body was taken East for burial, and a brief memorial service was held in the chapel at the same time as the burial service.

Unique Service in Old St. John's, Chuckatuck.

Unique services were held Sunday, November 13, in old St. John's, near Chuckatuck, when "Pruden" Day was observed. The Rev. Edward Miner conducted the services and celebrated the Holy Communion. This service was in honor of the Pruden family, who have been so prominent in the work of the Church, and who are the children of St. John's.

The Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., who was born at Ferry Point, near Chuckatuck, and who was baptized and received his first communion at Old St. John's, preached the sermon.

The Rev. Nathaniel Pruden, a retired minister of the Methodist Church, who also received his first communion at St. John's, was present and made an address. The Rev. A. A. Pruden, chaplain in the U. S. A., could not be present.

Mission Work in Campbell County.

On Sunday morning, November 13, Bishop Jett visited St. Peter's Church, Altavista, and confirmed a class of three. In the afternoon he, together with the Rev. Thomas Carter Page, conducted a service at St. John's Church, near Gladys. Mr. Page, who is the rector of St. Peter's, at Altavista, and of Good Shepherd, at Evington, is also doing a most interesting and efficient work in reopening and awakening interest in several other churches in Campbell County, which have been almost dormant for a number of years past. One of these is St. John's. Others are Christ Church, also near Gladys, but in a different direction, and the Church of Our Saviour, formerly known as Blue Door Chapel, which is located between Rustburg and Evington.

Each of these three points has a small but very earnest membership, and it is hoped that, under the energetic and faithful leadership of Mr. Page, they will experience a steady growth. Trinity Church, Rustburg, in future will be under the care of the Rev. Carlton Barnwell, rector of Grace Memorial Church, Lynchburg, in order that Mr. Page may be able to devote more time to his mission work at the other points in the county.

At the Synod: Bishop Jett, together with the Rev. Messrs. W. G. Pendleton, D. D., of Lynchburg; Thomas D. Lewis, of Amherst; J. Lewis Gibbs, of Staunton, and J. M. Robeson, of Lynchburg, and Captain John G. Osborne, of Radford, and Mr. R. L. Peirce, of Wytheville, represented this Diocese at the sessions of the Synod of the Province of Washington, which met in Wilmington, Del. The Rev. Karl M. Block, of Roanoke, who is chairman of the Sub-Committee on Religious Education from the Executive Board of this Diocese, was also in attendance. Bishop Jett was elected President of the Provincial Board of Religious Education and Chairman of the Provincial Committee on Church Schools and Colleges. In the former office he succeeds the late Bishop Rogers Israel, of Erie.

The Centennial Pageant, "The Mission of the Church," was impressively presented on Sunday evening, November 6, in Christ Church, Blacksburg (the Rev. W. B. Lee, Jr., rector).

Taking part in this pageant were fifty people, including the children from the Sunday school, professors and cadets from Virginia Polytechnic Institute, ladies of the congregation, the Rev. J. A. Figg, from Christiansburg, and the rector of the church. The parts of the Three Voices were taken by Dr. J. W. Watson, Professor A. B. Massey and Dr. F. D. Fromme. One of the Mandarin characters was represented by a V. P. I. cadet, a native of China, who formerly attended a parochial school in his own country.

Meeting of the Alumni of the Virginia Seminary.

The autumn meeting of the Philadelphia Association of Students of the Virginia Theological Seminary was held on Thursday, November 10, in St. Andrew's Parish House, Wilmington, Del., the Rev. Richard W. Trapnell, rector. The president, the Rev. Mr. Trapnell, opened the meeting with prayer and presided.

On motion, the president appointed a committee with the Rev. A. A. Lamb as chairman, to arrange for a pilgrimage by automobiles for as many of the thirty-three members of the Association as could go for Alumni Day at the Seminary next June.

The invitation of the Rev. Joseph H. Earp, to hold the spring meeting with him in the old church at New Castle, Del., was accepted with thanks.

At the close of the business meeting a delightful luncheon was served in the parish house by the ladies of St. Andrew's Church.

An "all-day missionary meeting" was held in the parish house of Holy Trinity Church, November 16, by the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese. Archdeacon James S. Russell, of Lawrenceville, Va., spoke on Negro Missions, and brought with him the famous sextette of negro boys from St. Paul's School, who sang. Other speakers were S. Harrington Littel, of Hankow Mission, China; the Rev. G. D. Christian, of the Indian Mission at Juneau, Alaska, and the Rev. W. S. Claiborne, of Tennessee.

The eighty-second local assembly of the Daughters of the King of the Diocese was held Thursday evening, November 17, in the parish house of St. Matthew's Church, the Rev. C. Herbert Reese, rector. Franklin H. Spencer, Esq., Executive Secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, was the speaker.

The Rev. A. J. Arkin completed his twentieth year as rector of St. George's Church Sunday, November 20. Bishop Rhinelander conducted the service Monday evening, and after the service a reception was given by the parishioners to Mr. Arkin. On Friday evening there was another gathering of the members, with Bishop Garland as the speaker.

A new reredos, paneling and communion rail were dedicated in the Memorial Church of St. Paul, Philadelphia, Sunday evening, November 13. The reredos was in memory of Samuel T. Buck, Jr., and Louis H. Koehler, two boys of the church who died in the service during the war. The communion rail was dedicated in memory of Peter A. Lynch, a former Sunday school teacher and vestryman in the church.

The annual service of the Bishop White Prayer Book Society was held Sunday morning, November 20, in Calvary Church, Germantown. The Rev. Dr. Henry R. Gummey, member of the Commission on Revision of the Prayer Book, preached the sermon.

In the last year the society distributed 15,232 Prayer Books and Hymnals to church missions in fifty-five dioceses.

Work in Ashe County.

Bishop Horner has recently made visitations in Ashe County, visiting the various points as follows: Holy Trinity, Glendale Springs, where, on the Blue Ridge, Miss J. R. Field, the devoted missionary, has been stationed for the past eight years, doing a noble work as Christian worker, superintendent of the Sunday school, teacher of the Bible class, "lay reader," in the absence of pastoral oversight, which that mission receives in summer only, when the Rev. Robert E. Roe, of Greensboro, gives his services for a month. Miss Field is also community nurse, medical advisor and legal authority. She has made the Mission House not only a community centre, but at times a hospital, she being a registered pharmacist, acting as doctor when the local practitioner is unavailable. The Bishop also visited Glendale Springs, St. Mary's, Beaver Creek and West Jefferson, where he had service and preached in the new Methodist chapel, and St. Matthew's Church, Todd. At every service an excellent congregation greeted him and listened eagerly to his sermons.

Unveiling of Honor Roll Tablet in Trinity Church, New Orleans.

On Friday, November 11, at 11 o'clock, when the people of our nation celebrated their fourth Armistice Day, a very beautiful and impressive service was held in Trinity Church, New Orleans, the Rev. R. S. Coupland, D. D., rector. The service was divided into three periods: Intercessions, memorial prayers and victory celebration.

Intercessory prayers for the Limitation of Arms Conference were offered up and appropriate hymns sung.

Memorial prayers were said for those who laid down their lives during the World War, and the hymn which was written in loving memory of them, "The Supreme Sacrifice," was sung, followed by Kipling's Recessional. During that part of the service when victory was celebrated a very handsome bronze tablet, made by J. & R. Lamb, of New York, was unveiled. This tablet bears names of one hundred and twenty-two members of Trinity Parish, men and women, who went out to the great war and served their country "by land and sea and sky." There was one gold star on the tablet. That was opposite the name of F. Codman Ford, Jr., who died in the service.

There were ten doctors who went out from Trinity Parish, thirty-two officers, ten overseas Red Cross workers, three nurses, sixty-six enlisted men and one chaplain, the rector of the parish. The unveiling of the tablet was most impressive. The original service flag, white bunting with the one hundred and twenty-two blue stars and the one gold star, covered the tablet.

After the dedicatory prayers two United States officers, one representing the army, the other the navy, Captain Skyles and Lieutenant Gaspard, unveiled the tablet. Dr. Coupland explained that this was in no sense a memorial, but just a mark to show in later years Trinity's part in the World War.

Armistice Sunday Fittingly Celebrated.

Trinity Church, Williamsport, the Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, rector, observed Armistice Sunday in accordance with the proclamations of the President and Governor, and the call of the Presiding Bishop and Council, in the usual fitting and glorious manner which has made all the special services of this parish so popular. The flags of the Allies and the emblems of the wartime welfare agencies, including the Salvation Army and Knights of Columbus, were carried by officers of the respective bodies, and the color guard which carried the national colors in the Armistice Day parade bore them in the procession after the choir. The songs of the Allies were sung, and as each was being sung by choir and congregation the flags of that nation was waved from the chancel steps. For the offertory, Kipling's Recessional was sung to DeKoven's setting. The prayers issued by the Department of Social Service for the period of the Conference were used by the rector. The address was to have been made by Major General William G. Price, Jr., commander of the Twenty-eighth Division in France and present commander of all Pennsylvania troops, but owing to the illness of his mother, he was unable to attend, and John G. Reading, Esq., addressed the Legion men and large congregation that filled the church, making an eloquent and appropriate address.

The congregation of St. John's, South Williamsport, gave a surprise reception to their rector, the Rev. Charles R. Barnes, on the evening of November 10, this being the first anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood. The senior warden, Mr. Charles W. Palmer, spoke of the pleasure and satisfaction of the congregation with their rector, and of the prosperous condition of the parish. As a tangible expression of their affection, the rector was presented with a sum of money.

On a recent visit of the Bishop to the Church of the Holy Cross, Harrisburg (colored), five were confirmed, thirteen men were organized into a chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and a branch of the Woman's Auxiliary of a dozen women was also organized.

LEXINGTON

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

The Church of the Ascension, Frankfort, the Rev. John Gass, rector, has just suffered a great loss in the death of Mrs. William Saffell on November 8. Mrs. Saffell had been the President of the Ladies' Guild for more than twenty-five years, and always took a prominent part in the work of all organizations of the parish.

New Chapel Opened.

St. Alban's Chapel, erected by St. Clement's Parish, at Elm and Wheeling Streets, to serve Manhattan Heights, El Paso, Tex., has been completed and was opened on Sunday afternoon, November 6, for inspection by the public.

Among those present to greet the visitors and show them over the chapel were the rector of St. Clement's, the Rev. Fuller Swift and Mrs. Swift; the vicar of St. Alban's Chapel, the Rev. Corwin C. Miller, and Mrs. Miller; Mr. J. J. Ormsbee, senior warden, and Mrs. Ormsbee; Mr. Volney L. Stiles, junior warden, and Mrs. Stiles; Mr. O. H. Thorman, the architect, and Mrs. Thorman, and Mr. R. E. McGhee, the contractor, and Mrs. McGhee; and many others interested in this new branch of St. Clement's work in El Paso.

On Sunday, December 11, the Rt. Rev. Frederick B. Howden, D. D., Bishop, with the clergy of St. Clement's, the vicar of St. Alban's and a number of invited clergy from out of town, will dedicate the chapel.

St. Alban's Chapel is the realization of a part of the plan of church extension which Dr. Swift proposed soon after he became rector of St. Clement's Parish. Dr. Swift and his vestry believe that the church should be taken to the people. While it is expected that the parish church of St. Clement's will continue to be a strong and well-equipped down town center, it has been planned to erect three other chapels in the different sections of the city for the convenience of the people of the Episcopal Church.

St. George's Church, Maplewood.

Since the Rev. Francis H. Richey took charge three years ago of St. George's Church, Maplewood, much has been accomplished besides the building of the beautiful new parish house, which was opened for service in January of this year. In November, 1918, St. George's had 340 communicants on its rolls. It now has 427, and the list has been cleared of "dead wood." Three years ago the average attendance at the Sunday school was 150. It is now more than 200, with four officers and twenty-four teachers. As has been said, the congregations have doubled in numbers. In addition to this, the choir has been greatly improved and enlarged under the efficient management of Mr. Frank A. Shackleford.

The cornerstone of the new parish house, costing about $23,000, for St. Peter's Church, Clifton, was placed on November 19, and the following day the twenty-fifth anniversary of the beginning of the church was observed.

Armistice Day Services.

The success of the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments was invoked in the city of Sioux Falls, S. D., Armistice Oay, in all the churches by special prayer service, conducted through the Ministerial Union and other pastors not connected with that organization.

The plan was suggested by Bishop Hugh L. Burleson, and received the unanimous endorsements of the other clergymen of the city, Bishop Burleson being appointed to draw up a call to prayer for all citizens, the call being signed by the pastors of ten Protestant churches.

The Cathedral was open from 9 until 5 o'clock, and the other churches from 9 o'clock until noon, and during those hours hundreds of men and women gathered for prayer.

At 11 o'clock, in all the churches, there were short services by the pastors in respect to the unknown soldier buried at the corresponding hour in Washington.

Work On the Isle of Pines.

Owing to a shifting of population on the Isle of Pines, it has been deemed desirable to make a change in the centre of administration. Therefore, the minister in charge of the five missions on that island has changed his residence to Nueva Gerona, the capital, or county seat. A house has been purchased for the use of a school in that town, and it is already too small for the number of applications. The principal teacher was at one time a teacher in the Diocesan School in Springfield, Ill.

There are four church buildings on the island, at the following places: Santa Fe, with a rectory, Columbia, McKinley and Santa Barbara. Mr. Decker, the missionary in charge, holds bi-weekly services in all of these places, together with an occasional service in Los Indios. At this latter place he baptized seven persons.

In Santa Barbara the congregation is larger than that of any other religious body on the island. There is an active guild which has provided the chancel furniture, all made of sabicu wood, one of the finest and hardest woods known. The guild has also provided all the necessary hangings for the various seasons of the Church year, and has made special offerings in the name of the Woman's Auxiliary, of which there is no branch at this place.

Collect for the First Sunday in Advent.

Almighty God, give us grace that we may cast away the works of darkness, and put upon us the armour of light, now in the time of this mortal life, in which Thy Son Jesus Christ came to visit us in great humility that in the last day, when He shall come again in His glorious Majesty to judge both the quick and the dead, we may rise to the life immortal, through Him Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, now and ever. Amen.

Collect for St. Andrew's Day.

Almighty God, Who didst give such grace unto Thy holy Apostle St. Andrew, that he readily obeyed the calling of Thy Son Jesus Christ and followed Him without delay; grant unto us all, that we, being called by Thy Holy Word, may forthwith give up ourselves obediently to fulfil Thy Holy commandments; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Angel, Dost Thou Visit Me?

Gene Scott Wright.

Angel, dost thou visit me?
Low my door is for thy head;
Stoop, the threshold's clear for thee,
Consecrate it by thy tread.
I have swept my dwelling clean,
Bright my hearth-fire burns for thee.
Angel, I invite thee in,
Enter, now, and talk with me.

Tell me of the King of kings,
Who thy Master is, and mine:
Teach me of His heavenly things,
Help me worship at His shrine.
I am weary of the dross,
Of the tinsel and the lace,
Weary of both gain and loss—
Lift me to a higher place.

There no thrill of clapping crowd,
Nor chill from fickle plaudits lost;
No more of place and power proud—
Too well I know the endless cost.
Angel, I have sought Him long
In the daylight and the dark—
Now He's sent thee, True and Strong,
He has sent thee with His mark.

I have swept my dwelling clean,
Cheerful bright my hearth-fire burns;
I am not as I have been—
Come—ere banished foe returns.
Lest he find an empty place,
Lest he take me unaware,
Angel, now unveil thy face,
Be my heart-guest, sweet and fair.

A Moral Victory.

Mary Graham.

"I might as well give up at once and go right into business with father," said Henry Elliott to his intimate friend and crony, James Carson.

"Why, what do you mean? I thought your one aim and ambition was to get into college this fall."

"So it has been all along—but I always hoped that when it came to the point 'dad' would provide the wherewithal; and now he says positively that unless I can win a scholarship or earn the money in some way myself, there will be no college education for me."

"But I thought you were fully depending on the scholarship—you know that is my only hope of going—and I understood that we were working together with the same end in view."

"You know very well I could never stand the exams. in mathematics, nor could you do much better in Latin and German, without me there to help you along."

"But why couldn't we help each other along? I am sure we could manage it somehow. Plenty of fellows have got through that way and come out with honors."

"What under the sun do you mean, Jim?"

"Well, we'll be in the same room, coming from the same high school, and those college men who watch the candidates are very blind or wrapped up in some book of metaphysics or other abstruse stuff, so that it would be the easiest thing in the world for us to effect a 'change of ideas'—'fair exchange is no robbery, you know.'"

Henry stood still, aghast at this revelation from the one who had been his bosom friend and companion for the last six months.

"Why, Jim!" he said slowly and solemnly, "that would be cheating, and we could never stoop to anything so mean and contemptible as that."

His companion's face reddened and then grew paler than its wont, and he hesitated for a few moments before replying. Then he blurted out, as if aware that he was expressing an unwelcome truth:

"Well, what under the sun have we both been doing, then? Only exchanging ideas for the last few months, and who has been harmed by it? What difference does it make whether the exchange takes place in the examination room, under the nose of the 'watchers,' or in the privacy of our own homes?"

"But what do you mean, Jim? We had the consent and approval of our parents to help each other along—you to give me the benefit of your talent in mathematics and I to help you with the languages, which seemed so easy for me. But I am sure not one of our parents would consent to the proposition you have just made: to cheat in an examination—" he was about to add, "I, who have always been considered the soul of honor, both at home and at school," but a feeling of modesty as well as a dawning doubt of himself held him back.

James, too, hesitated before explaining his meaning. He had realized more fully than his companion just what they had been doing for the last few months of comradeship.

"It is true," he said slowly, "that our parents consented that we should exchange 'lessons'; that I should explain difficult problems to you, while you should help me to understand the construction of those two bothersome languages. But how long did we keep this up? Don't you remember that first day last fall when we dropped all explanations so as to be on time for football? You copied my work in algebra and I copied your translation, and from that day to this there have been about three real lessons exchanged between us. There was always some reason why the explanations were dropped, and we simply copied each other's work. How much more do you know in mathematics than you did in the beginning of the term except what you managed to learn in the class-room? For myself, I can safely say that I am walking in a mist when I try to translate a sentence in Latin or German, just as I did at first."

"Don't say any more," exclaimed Henry, holding up his hands as if to ward off a blow. He felt dazed under the realization that he had been doing what he had always despised in others, cheating at his lessons. Why had he not realized it before? It seemed so plain, now that his tempter had turned into accuser.

But was that quite fair on Jim? Who was it that had first proposed "cutting" the first explanation so as to be on hand in time for football? He could hardly remember. He only knew that ever since then, the first falling off had grown into a habit which had sapped, as it were, the foundation from under his better knowledge of mathematics, and that of his friend's understanding of the two languages in which he had been supposed to help him.

The next day the announcement was made of the names of the boys who could compete with boys of the various schools for a scholarship. The ten who stood highest on the list for their work throughout the year were the ones allowed to enter into the competition. James Carson's name was ninth and Henry Elliot's tenth, while that of a very studious, deserving boy, John Atherton, was just below.

Henry went to the president of the school at recess and told him he wished to withdraw from the competition for this year and would like John Atherton to be sent in his place.

"That is very generous of you, Henry—"

"No! not generous; only just. He deserves it far more than I do."

"Are you willing to give your reason for the withdrawal before the assembled class? I cannot otherwise accept such an unusual sacrifice."

Henry winced, but there was a look of almost fierce determination in his face as he nodded assent, unable to speak another word just at that moment.

The gong sounded for the end of recess and the boys re-assembled for final words of advice and leave-taking.

"One of your number has generously offered to give up his chance of a scholarship for the boy next below on the list, John Atherton. As I do not just understand his reason for doing so, he has consented to state it before the class. Henry, you now have the floor."

The boys cheered as Henry rose to speak, but quieted down when they saw how pale and nervous he looked, twisting one hand around the other. Could this be their own Henry Elliott, champion football player, usually so much at ease with himself and all the world?

"I have been cheating at mathematics all through the term, without realizing it, and have not come by the honor fairly," he said in a low, trembling, though perfectly distinct tone.

"Cheating!" was passed from one to the other in an astonished whisper. This from Henry Elliott, who had always been held up to them by every teacher as a "pattern," the "soul of honor" and everything that was commendable.

The boy bowed his head in shame at a prolonged silence throughout the room. But, after all, that was not nearly so hard to bear as the stings of his own conscience had been.

A reaction was already beginning in his favor, and the silence might soon have ended in a cheer, when another boy arose, and gesticulating wildly from right to left, commanded silence, as he, too, had something to say.

The president rapped with his gavel and announced that James Carson now had the floor.

"If Henry Elliott cheated in mathematics, so did I in languages, and will resign my chance for a scholarship this year. We started out by each explaining the hard places to the other, which would have been all right and honest, but we ended by simply copying, so that neither of us feels that we know enough to go up for the examination and take it fairly. Henry did not realize that we had not been fair and above board until I proposed doing the same for each other in the examination. So he has opened my eyes and I his, and we will both begin over again and study on our own hook for another year."

A prolonged cheer went up for the two boys, and the president allowed them to give vent to their enthusiasm over what every boy in the room now realized was a fine and manly action.

It is needless to say that the two chums went to work in real earnest, each determined to overcome his difficulties in the branches which had seemed like such stumbling-blocks in the way of their entrance into college.

By the next year each was ready to enter the competition with high hopes, knowing that faithful work, done by his own unaided effort, could hardly fail to bring its reward.

Taking a Stand.

"But he isn't tactful. He has no hesitation about hurting people's feelings. You can never build a church up in that way." How familiar such expressions are, and they are expressions that one hears used in connection with both the clergy and laity. Now there is no need for any one going through this world continually hurting people's feelings and always finding fault, but at the present time there is a great deal of need for a large number of people to take a very definite stand for the underlying principles of the Christian faith. Our Lord founded His Church on certain well-defined, fundamental principles, and we find that His earliest followers were very careful to carry out His teaching in every particular. There were no arguments as to whether baptism was essential. Christ had instituted baptism as the means of admission to His Church, and there was no question about it, there was no argument. And the Holy Communion. A modern writer, a Presbyterian, says: "The high place of the Eucharist in the services of the Church dates from the earliest times. In the apostolic age it was celebrated every day and was considered as necessary as one's breakfast. There was no expressing of individual opinion as the necessity or value of that which Christ Himself gave to His Church. But today one hears people discussing matters of this kind as if they were discussing some domestic problem on which there might be one or a thousand opinions. And so all through the Church we find discussions going on concerning matters that Christ Himself settled for us. Men may take it upon themselves to depart from the teaching of Christ and depart from the practices of the Church, but they cannot do that kind of thing and consider themselves loyal or good citizens of the kingdom. There isn't the slightest doubt but that the so-called weakness of the Christian Church today is due in large part to the fact that there has been a feeling for far too many years that after all it really doesn't make much difference as to what you believe, etc., and that all creeds and all religions are leading in the same direction, with the result that many men and women who have taken that "splendid, broad, liberal view of things" are not walking in any religious road at all. They have no creed, no church connections, no church home, and from a religious point of view they are not an asset in the community in which they live. When children know that some otherwise influential citizen has no connection with the Church, the effect upon their mind is not healthy.

We need to advertise the Church in the right way; we need clergy who will bring to the people strong, virile messages; we need the right kind of organizations in connection with the Church; but above everything else we need men and women who are convinced of the truth as it is in Christ, willing to stand up and show their colors without the slightest hesitation or fear. The best advertisement for the Church in any community is a body of Christian people who are loyal to the Church in every sense in which that term can be used.—Minn. Missionary.

An Ideal Home.

"What," asked the instructor, "is your ideal of a perfect home?"

"A home where no two people ever lose their tempers or get out of sorts at the same time," answered the student.

The class laughed. The answer had been somewhat flippant and perhaps not to the point—and still—"a place where no two people were ever out of sorts at the same time." Just what would that mean?

It would mean, obviously, that the people living in such a home would have very few "grouches," if any at all, for one can hardly have a "grouch" all by one's self.

It would mean that friction—that physical property that creates such havoc in human lives—would not exist there, and so the household machinery would go smoothly indeed.

It would mean that the family would be physically fit and in good health, for bad constitutions make bad dispositions.

It would mean that the people in the home would be contented, for disagreements come with discontentment, and it would mean that there would be high ideals there, for contentment comes with happiness and happiness is impossible without high ideals.

"A place where no two people ever lose their tempers or get out of sorts at the same time." Would that, after all, be such a bad ideal for a home?—The Iowa Homemaker.

Ways of Thanking God.

One can put thankfulness to God into his manner by saying "Good morning" to a neighbor. Indeed, one does not need to go out of his own household to find a way of thanking God by words not addressed to Him, and by deeds that are for Him only as they may be for His sake.—Interior.

For the Young Folks

Service.

You never hear the robins brag about the sweetness of their song,
Nor do they stop their music gay whene'er a poor man comes along.
God taught them how to sing, an' when they'd learned the art He sent them here
To use their talents day by day the dreary lives o' men to cheer.
An' rich or poor an' sad or gay, the ugly an' the fair to see,
Can stop most any time in June an' hear the robins' melody.

I stand an' watch them in the sun, usin'
their gifts from day to day,
Swellin' their little throats with song,
regardless of man's praise or pay:
Jes' bein' robins, nothing else, nor claiming greatness for their deeds, Singin' a lesson to us all to be ourselves and scatter cheer
By usin' every day the gifts God gave us when He sent us here.

Why should we keep our talents hid, or think we favor men because
We use the gifts that God has given?
The robins never ask applause,
Nor count themselves remarkable, nor strut in a superior way,
Because their music sweeter is than that
God gave unto the jay.
Only a man conceited grows as he makes use of talents fine,
Forgetting that he merely does the working of the Will Divine.

Lord, as the robins, let me serve! Teach me to do the best I can
To make this world a better place, an'
happier for my fellowman,
If gift o' mine can cheer his soul an'
hearten him along his way
Let me not keep that talent hid; I would make use of it today.
An' since the robins ask no praise or pay for all their songs o' cheer,
Let me in humbleness rejoice to do my bit o' service here.

Timmy-Ted.

For a whole week Nelson Wright's bird cage had stood empty by the open window of his bedroom. Ever since the morning when he had carelessly left the door open for a moment and so given the canary a chance to fly away he had watched for his return. He kept the door wide open and all the little dishes filled with seed or fresh water. If the wanderer should come back he would not fail to receive a hearty welcome.

Meanwhile Nelson studied carefully the "Lost and Found" column in the daily paper, particularly the column headed "Found." There were many different things mentioned in that list: dogs, cats, horses, jewelry, pocketbooks—everything except canaries. But he would not give up the search.

One morning he came to the bottom of the "Found" column with a sigh. Nothing to reward him this time either; he wished that he had the money to advertise for Timmy. Then he began to read the "Lost" column—aimlessly, for that seemed rather a useless thing to do. His forefinger moved slowly down through the advetrisements. A tan-and-white terrier, a red cow, a lady's handbag, a pearl pin—he was about to throw the paper aside when all at once his traveling finger came to a halt.

"There!" he cried. "Ten dollars reward for the return of a yellow canary," he read aloud. That was strange! Could some one have been kind enough to insert an advertisement for him? He was hurrying on to read the rest when a familiar fluttering sound in the next room attracted his attention. He threw aside the paper and rushed into the bedroom. Sure enough, just as he had hoped, a little patch of yellow was shining in the cage! The patch began to bob up and down, and Nelson cried out joyfully:

"So you're ready for your dinner at last, you little truant! Well, I think it's high time!"

He hurried to the cage and quickly shut and fastened the door.

Then he turned to the window and was about to lower it when he noticed a knot of boys down on the pavement. They were looking up at him.

"Did a canary fly into your house?" one of the boys asked.

"Yes," said Nelson. "My own bird flew in. He got loose last week, and he's just come back."

The boys looked disappointed. "Oh, so it's your bird," they said. "We found him in a tree in the next block," one of them explained. "When we tried to catch him he flew into a tree across the street, and then into this window."

"Well, I should probably never have seen him again," Nelson said, "if you hadn't shooed him over this way. Thank you."

The boys turned to go. "It's funny," one of them said. "We were looking for another canary when we caught sight of yours."

"Oh, I know," said Nelson; "the ten-dollar-reward canary, wasn't it? I saw the notice in the paper."

When the boys had gone Nelson turned gleefully to the cage. "Timmy! You scamp!" he cried. "You've grown fat as a seal."

The bird hopped over to a little dish of water. As he tilted his head to drink he showed a ring of black feathers round his neck. Nelson started. Timmy didn't have a black feather on his whole body. Looking harder, the boy saw that one of the bird's toenails was broken. Timmy had no broken toenail. True, the black ring on the yellow feathers might possibly be soot, and the toenail might have been lately broken; but a dreadful suspicion had come to Nelson. He determined to make a final test. Thrusting his finger between the bars of the cage, he whistled softly. Timmy, he knew, would instantly hop to the proffered finger and give a sharp little "tweet" that meant, "How do you do?"

Alas, the bird merely looked up for an instant and then went on drinking. Nelson knew then that it was not his canary.

He sat down in a chair and began to think. The ten-dollar reward came into his mind. How much that person must love his pet to offer such a large reward! Presently he rose and picked up the cage.

"Well, one thing is certain, old chap," he said. "You've got to go back where you belong."

Nelson went into the next room and looked again at the advertisement. He found that the address was only a few blocks away—210 Allen Street. "They must be rich people," he thought, "to offer ten dollars for a bird."

Putting on his cap and taking a firm hold on the cage, he went trudging off on his errand.

To his surprise, 210 Allen Street proved to be a plain, weather-beaten little house set back in a gloomy-looking yard.

"I don't wonder the canary flew away," Nelson said aloud as he went up the walk.

A little old woman opened the door and peered out. When she saw the bird she gave a cry of pleasure.

"I knew I should get him back!" she cried. Nelson handed her the cage, and a moment later the canary was in her hands. "His name is Ted," she exclaimed to Nelson, "and this is the first time he ever went away. I'll take him back to his cage," she added. "You wait a minute." She came back fumbling in the pocket of her apron. "It's worth ten dollars to have him again," she said.

Nelson had to admit to himself that the folded bill looked very attractive; nevertheless, he turned away.

"No," he said. "I couldn't take money for finding your bird—and I didn't find him anyway. Some other boys chased him into my window. Besides, I know what it feels like to lose a canary."

The old lady looked up quickly. "You do?" she said. "Have you lost one yourself?" Then she added abruptly, "Come into my sitting-room."

Wondering, Nelson turned back to follow her down the dark little hall. As he did so there was a burst of song in the room beyond.

Nelson stopped in his tracks. "That's not your bird singing," he said. "It's mine—my Timmy; I can't mistake his voice."

The old lady threw open the door of the room. "It's the little strange bird that a man found and brought here this morning," she said. "When I told him it wasn't my bird he asked me to take care of it, and so I put it by the window in Ted's cage."

Nelson rushed into the room. There, singing in the bright sunshine, was Timmy, safe and sound. Nelson went straight up to the cage and thrust his finger through the bars. Instantly the little runaway stopped singing and perched upon the proffered finger.

"Tweet!" he said clearly.

"You rascal!" Nelson said. "Get out of that borrowed cage and come back where you belong. I think I shall call you Timmy-Ted after this."

And Timmy-Ted the canary remained for the rest of his days.—Marion Heyn, in Youth's Companion.

An Idea Originated by this Cleveland Church Society is Spreading Like Wild Fire

HOW IT HAPPENED

SOME one conceived the idea that Candy Mints would be easy to sell, and every one seemed to agree, so a committee was appointed to call on Strong, Cobb & Company, Cleveland, O., a large manufacturing concern, who were the first in the country to make Mints.

The outcome of this interview resulted in the Company agreeing to get up a special package called "22 Mints," which contained 320 5-cent rolls that cost $9.00 and sell for $16.00, making $7.00 profit. Four Flavors, Peppermint, Wintergreen, Cinnamon, and Clove. Packed 80 packages to a box, four boxes to a case.

The sale has proven so easy and successful, and so much enthusiasm has been created by one telling another, that the Company is now filling orders for "22 Mints" from all parts of the country. Here are extracts from some of the letters received.

HOW IT WORKS

Miss Mary E. Orr, 2007 Garrard Ave., Covington, Ky., says: "Enclosed find money order for $9.00. Please send as soon as possible one case of '22 Mints.' I am ordering these for our Young Woman's Society of our church. We have already sold two cases."

Dr. E. L. Chapman, D. O., 1017 Jackson St., Anderson, Ind., says: "Our girls are delighted with the '22 Mints.' They sell fine."

Miss Lillian Caldwell, Freedom School, Alliance, O., says: "Enclosed find order for three cases of '22 Mints.' Please rush this order, as we are having many calls for more candy."

Mrs. Jessie Meverdere, Sturgeon Bay, Wis., says: "Please send another order of Mints. Only had the other case a week, and they are nearly all gone."

Mrs. L. F. Johnson, Corresponding Secretary W. C. T. U., Erie, Pa., says: "The Mints sold like hot cakes and are fine. Have recommended same to others."

Your society can do the same. Send $9.00 now for a case of "22 Mints" and they will be sent prepaid express or parcel post

A Hymn of Thanksgiving.

We thank Thee, Father, for the years
Thy love has shared our hopes and fears;
We bless Thee for Thy guiding hand
Which points us toward the promised land.

Thy cloud by day, Thy fire by night,
Have clearly shown the path that's right;
Our marching orders from Thy Word
Have made us sure, "Thus saith the Lord."

We bless Thee for a faith that knows
The reason for its heart's repose;
We praise Thee for a love that bears
The burden of our sins and cares.

Abide with us, O Christ of God,
Thou Who hast traveled on our road;
Be with Thy Church for years to come,
And daily cheer our journey home.

—Rev. Charles M. Sheldon.

If You Lived On the Moon.

Of course, you couldn't really live on the moon, because there is no air there; but if you didn't die—

You could jump thirty-six feet in the air, since the force of gravitation is one-sixth of what it is here.

You could not speak, because there would be no air to make sound waves.

You could not smell, because smelling requires air to carry particles of substance to your nose.

You would have a whole month to work and play in every day, for the moon takes a complete spin on its axis in just the same time that it takes to go around the earth—that is, twenty-seven and one-third days, or what we call a lunar month.—Everyland.

The Empty Nest.

In the spring the oriole sang:
"See me! see me! see!—
I am going to hang a nest
In this tall elm tree.
It will be a cradle safe
For the wind to sway
Back and forth—back and forth—
All the summer day."

In the autumn little birds
Spread their wings for flight
With their mother for the South
One October night.
Back and forth—back and forth—
Swings the empty nest,
Where these birds were cradled soft
'Neath their mother's breast.

A Child's Prayer for Morning.

The morning bright,
With rosy light,
Hath waked me from my sleep;
Father, I own
Thy love alone
Thy little ones doth keep.

All through the day
I humbly pray,
Be Thou my Guard and Guide;
My sins forgive,
And let me live,
Blest Jesus, near Thy side.

Oh make Thy rest
Within my breast,
Great Spirit of all grace!
Make me like Thee;
Then shall I be Prepared to see Thy face.

To Father, Son,
And Spirit One,
Great God Whom I adore,
All glory be,
My God, to Thee,
Both now and evermore.

Gray: Died, November 8, 1921, ADELAIDE HAYMAN, widow of the late Robert A. Gray, of "Eastwood," Stafford County, Va. A life-long communicant of the Church and lover of the Southern Churchman.

"O happy saint, forever blest
In that dear home, how sweet your rest."

RESOLUTIONS.

At the death of JOHN PUNNETT PETERS, rector-emeritus of St. Michael's Church, the vestry of the parish wish to give formal expression to their gratitude for his quarter-century of devoted service as rector to the spiritual life of this church and to their appreciation of his steadfast co-operation with them in the conduct of its material affairs.

It is for this vestry a source of pride that through our late rector this parish has been nobly associated with public movements of widespread social beneficence and with the initiation of far-reaching social reforms.

Dr. Peters' large experience in exploration of holy lands and his insight into ancient spiritual developments, lending to his work as preacher the authority of his learning and the persuasion of his personality, maintained St. Michael's in the good tradition of broad catholicity in fearless churchmanship.

In all the years of Dr. Peters' ministry with us his pulpit never gave an uncertain call to Christian work or social service. To the training of youth he brought a winning sympathy and clearness of intellectual vision which made his preparations for confirmation lasting and grateful memories, while those under his pastoral charge in each later need or trial found in him a ready and helpful counsellor.

The zealous citizen, the keen searcher for fruitful truth, the wise interpreter of past and present, the bountiful scholar, the faithful friend will long be missed in wider circles than we know. To us in St. Michael's Parish there can be few indeed who do not feel that their own lives are the poorer by John Punnett Peters' death.

ANOTHER NEW ERA OPENING.

Today's action, officials said, marked a new departure in American industry. Thile the 'plant congress' idea has been tried with varying success in other lines, the packing-houses were the first national industry to attempt this method of employee representation in the management.

Ten days ago the companies announced in a statement to their employees that a wage reduction would be necessary, and outlined their reasons for requesting the cut. Today's action was the result.

fficials of the company sa ythey suggested no figure for the proposed reduction. The employees' representatives called for the books, and, from the company's financial showing, figured out the reduction which was adopted. The action, it was emphasized, was purely voluntary on the part of the Employees' Committee, the company representatives agreeing to the cut proposed by the workers.

The final test of the plan will come, however, officials say, when it is seen whether or not the body of employees accept the decision of their chosen representatives."

The Reparations of Time.

Time, in truth, offers reparations to those who serve and suffer. Men bring eventually their meed of honor to those who build their lives into the kingdom of the Spirit. * * * And the Christ upon the cross! The Christ upon the cross! That life that went out after so brief a glory is the world's hope and the world's peace, the world's law and the world's conscious goal. Time has made its reparations. The centuries have sifted the lives of men. Mankind looks up through tears to its Saviour, who is its Teacher of the Reality and Persistence of the Plan to which man is called to give himself. The eye grew dim, but the vision shone on! The brain grew numb, but the purpose knew no change.—Lewis T. Reed.

Just as you would not give a little child the moral law in all its boldness and harshness to keep, but first sweeten the way of obedience by little rewards and promises which become helps to the doing of right, so the kindly Healer of all deals with the people, who were as little children in faith and spiritual insight. If my child believed that the heavenly Father came down to the park every night to wrap up the birds in their nests, I would not destroy that idea of Providence till I could graft a richer one upon it. Let us learn the Christ-like lesson of being weak to the weak and ignorant to the ignorant.—E. H. Higgins.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

During the past year business on the island was probably at its lowest point, but the people of the various colonies are full of hope and have reason to expect better times. There is a better feeling among them; they are learning how to grow and market their own products and not to depend on the raising of citrus fruits alone. There will now probably be a steady increase of population; and it is fortunate that there are churches and an active resident minister for the services.

The church building at McKinley was badly placed at its beginning. The proposed and expected town at that point did not realize. Consequently, the building was moved a distance of about a mile and a half some time ago. In the course of time almost all of the congregation removed from the new site of the church, and now, as there are few communicants left, it is proposed to move the building once more, and this time to Nueva Gerona, a distance of about nine miles. Should this be done, this will probably be the most widely traveled church building in the world.

Personal Notes

The Rev. J. J. Wilkins, D. D., rector of Grace Church, Kirkwood, Mo., has been chosen as acting Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, and assumed charge when Dean Davis left on November 1 for New York, to take up his work as Domestic Secretary of the Department of Missions. Dr. Wilkins, some years ago, was Dean of the Cathedral at Los Angeles, Cal. He left there to inaugurate work on behalf of relief for the aged clergy.

The Rev. Francis B. Blodgett, Professor of Old Testament in the General Theological Seminary, New York, who has accepted the invitation of Bishop Ward and the Cathedral Chapter to be the Dean of the Cathedral of St. Paul, Erie, Pa., will enter upon his duties on Sunday, December 18.

The Rev. George C. Shaw, rector of St. George's Church, Mount Savage, Md., who has accepted a call from Grace and St. Peter's Church to become the vicar of the Church of the Advent, Baltimore, will enter upon his new duties December 1.

The Rev. Thomas Lee Trott, after having served St. Mary's Church, High Point, N. C., for nearly four years, resigned this charge and is now rector of St. Peter's and St. Paul's Churches, Salisbury, N. C.

The Rev. Stephen Dows Thaw was instituted as rector in St. Paul's Church, Harrisburg, on Tuesday morning, November 8, by the Bishop of the Diocese. The letter of institution was read by the Rev. Edward C. Chorley, D. D., of Garrison, N. Y. The sermon was by the Rev. W. N. Clapp, of the Diocese of Pittsburgh.

The Rev. Canon John McPherson Almond, of Montreal, preached at both services Sunday, November 13, in the Church of St. Paul, Overbrook.

The Rev. Boston M. Lackey, of Raleigh, N. C., has been appointed secretary to the Bishop of North Carolina, the Rt. Rev. J. B. Cheshire, D. D.

Ordinations.

In St. Luke's Church, Evanston, Ill., on St. Michael's and All Angels' Day, the Rev. Harry Lee Smith was ordained priest by Bishop Griswold. Dr. Stewart presented the candidate. Mr. Smith came to St. Luke's just a year ago to study for Holy Orders, and was ordained deacon last spring. The day after his ordination Mr. Smith left for Park Ridge, where he had been elected rector of St. Mary's Church.

The Spiritual House
By the Rev. William Reed Huntington, D. D.

The quality of reason and beauty marking all of the late Dr. Huntington's work is is never more worthy of permanent preservation and popularity than in his fine little study of the Church structure and its fundamental function of spiritual suggestion.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"As we must account for every idle word, so we must for every idle silence."

No judgments are so cheap as those we pass upon each other's transgressions.

It is right to be contented with what we have, but not with what we are.—Sir James McIntosh.

The mission of Christ to the world may be expressed in three words—revelation, redemption, salvation.

"Go ye into all the world," makes us on God's side; "Lo, I am with you," means that He is on ours.—Dan Crawford.

"The gateway of the kingdom,
It bendeth very low,
Within the reach of every place
Where common people go.
It has no rusty hinges,
No marble steps are piled.
The gateway of the kingdom
Is the spirit of a child."

John Vassar once spoke to a lady of her soul's health, and she told her husband of what he had said. "I should have told him," said the husband, "to mind his own business." "If you had been there," said his wife, "you would have thought it was his business."—H. Thorne.

Remembrance of sin, and sense of redeeming love, will be the ground of praise and thanksgiving to God and the Lamb for ever in heaven. Why should it not be so now, seeing I have as good warrant from the Word of God to believe that my sin is wholly taken away, as if I were actually in heaven?—T. Adam.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., DECEMBER 3, 1921. No. 49.

WE MUST NOT FALTER

The latest message from Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer of the Presiding Bishop and Council, is such as to cause immediate concern. For the month of October the receipts on the general quota were $95,345.94 less than those of October, 1920, a decrease of more than 36 per cent. The total receipts of the year to date are $85,710.51 less than for the same period last year. At one time in the spring, as Mr. Franklin points out, the receipts were nearly $200,000 ahead of the corresponding period in 1920. He believes business is generally better now than in May, when the Church's income was at its peak. What is the matter?

It may be that part of the matter is that many treasurers of parishes and dioceses are still possessed with that obstinate habit of hoarding in bank the money which has been given for the Nation-Wide Campaign, and which ought immediately to be forwarded to the Central Treasury. It is curious how persistently men who are supposed to be dependable men of business will keep back—sometimes through mere indolence and sometimes in order to use the money temporarily for parish needs—the gifts which they have no right either to divert or to delay; and meanwhile the Church's general administration is paying interest on borrowed money and weighted with uncertainty as to when—and whether—it can pay off its accumulating debts. The first need, therefore, in connection with the present deficit in the general treasury is that parish and diocesan treasurers, prodded if need be by the most vigorous insistence on the part of everybody concerned, should send in to Mr. Franklin at once the Nation-Wide money which they actually hold in hand.

Beyond this, however, there lies a greater question. Is the Church in earnest about the Nation-Wide Campaign? Does she take her honor seriously, or will she repudiate the great adventure to which she has been committed? The answer lies with the Bishops and the other diocesan leaders, especially in those dioceses which in the first year responded only half-heartedly to the Nation-Wide appeal. The dioceses which shouldered the glorious full burden of their responsibility when the Nation-Wide Campaign began, and gave in 1920 far out of proportion to the rest of the Church, have planted the flags of courage where they ought to be. Please God, the end of 1921 shall show them flying still where they first were carried! But the Church at large must come forward. Why, for example, does New York, which has twice been most solemnly committed by its new Bishop to the support of the Nation-Wide Campaign, show a decrease of $37,519 to November 1 from the inadequate amount it gave in 1920? Why has Pennsylvania fallen back more than fifty thousand dollars? Do these great centres of the Church's financial strength mean to let the line of the Church's advance be broken? And will other dioceses falter at their side?

We do not believe it! The year is not ended. There is time left, especially with the great appeal of Christmastide included, for churches and dioceses which have thus far given inadequately to the Church's mission to give as deep down in their hearts they really want to do. Only let bishops and rectors make sure that they do not fail the people in the leadership of an inspiring faith!

WHO SHALL REPRESENT US IN 1922?

We do not want ever to seem unsympathetic with any group in this broad Church of ours. We believe in the Church's catholicity—the catholicity which, truly understood, means an eagerness to understand all wide approaches to the truth. We count as friends, and we recognize as earnest Christians, men whose thought is at far variance with ours. We would not impugn the worthiness of their ideals. Never with any uncharity would we seek to assail what they hold dear.

Yet there are times when facts must be faced, be the consequences of frank conflict what they may. For there come the inescapable occasions in which the question must be asked, Which point of view represents the prevailing mind and spirit of the Churh? The government of the Church, like the government of the State, is created by majorities; and those, therefore, who believe in a given principle cannot avoid the necessity of trying to secure the majority power for those convictions which they profoundly believe to be essential to the progress and the power of the Church. It is not that there need be any ungenerous attempt to deny or take away the privileges of others to think and worship as their conscience dictates; but those who believe one way in a crucial issue must try with all honest frankness to prevent those whose belief is opposite from developing an influence which would make their point of view not that of a little group within the Church, but that of the Church itself.

With this introduction to make plain the spirit in which we write, we go forward to make as unmistakable as possible the immediate meaning of what we want to say. In a few weeks the first of the diocesan conventions for 1922 will be assembling, and through the months from January to spring these conventions will be electing the delegates who will sit in the next General Convention. The tone and temper of that Convention will depend upon the point of view of those delegates. If the Convention is to be forward-looking, if it is to be not an antique relic of mediaevalism but a power of evangelical Christianity attuned to the living forces of today, we must not elect to that General Convention men who represent a propaganda which now is being assiduously circulated in the Church. The propaganda we refer to is that which is expressed most crassly in a little leaflet called "The Alliance Bulletin," which is described as being "the official organ of the Churchmen's Alliance."

It will be recalled that this Churchmen's Alliance was the organization which shouted loudest in the hue and cry against the confirmation of Herbert Shipman as Bishop Suffragan of New York. It was the Churchmen's Alliance which circulated most of the reports against him. The action of the standing committees and of the bishops doubtless brought very considerable chagrin to that Alliance, as it plainly brought defeat. But that does not mean that the Alliance has ceased to work. It is going to try to propagate churchmen of its own sort. It will want that sort elected to the General Convention. It will want this Church in its principles of Prayer Book revision, in its conception of Church unity, in all its life and purpose, to become a reflection of its own ideas.

Let us understand, then, some of the things which the Churchmen's Alliance is proclaiming. In its issue for November 6th there is a paragraph entitled "What Catholic Christians Do," in which, of course, the word "catholic" is spelled with a capital "C," in that curious insularity which turns a great, inclusive word into a party name. The bulletin says that under this title it will print "a series of simple instructions for lay-folk in the essential practices of the Catholic life." What are these "essential practices"? It is possible that some may be surprised to learn. The Alliance, however, is in no doubt that the Catholic Christian in his "essential practices" "begins his prayers with an 'Our Father,' and probably follows that with an 'Hail Mary.' * * * He particularly asks God for the protection of his guardian Angel, and asks his patron Saint to pray for him."

Further along in the same bulletin is another paragraph, entitled, "Notes on the Reformation." In it there is a description of the Reformation, particularly as it developed on the continent of Europe, which repudiates the value of all those influences which represented the Protestant spirit. "The three outstanding names," says the bulletin, "on the continent are Luther, Calvin and Zwingli. It is safe to say that no positive gain has survived the three hundred years since, one after another, they revolted personally from the Church."

Perhaps a commentary upon the opinion of this bulletin that no permanent gain has resulted from the heroic unshackling of the free spirit of worship from the bonds of sacerdotalism by such great souls as Luther and Calvin is furnished by the particular appeal which accompanies this bulletin of the Churchmen's Alliance. "Some misapprehension has arisen," it says, "with regard to the intercessions. We are not merely asking priests to remember the great cause of Catholic unity at some mass on Thanksgiving Day. We pray, of course, for unity at every mass." Then follows a list of the churches in the different dioceses where Low Mass, High Mass, Litany of the Saints, Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, and other agencies for Catholic unity are to be conducted.

As to the whole conception of the Church and the Church's worship which this dialect expresses, we have, as we said before, no uncharitable word to speak. There is a story ascribed to the homely wit of Abraham Lincoln which seems to us expressive. A book agent was nagging him to buy a book, and insisted that Mr. Lincoln should tell him why he did not want it and admit that it was a good book. The tradition is that Mr. Lincoln answered as follows: "It may be a very good book for the kind of man who likes that kind of a book." This method of worship in our Protestant Episcopal Church may be a very good kind of worship for the kind of people that like it, but we do not wish to see the propaganda of it spread through lack of notice as to its nature.

Does this Church want to see the revision of the Prayer Book shaped by men who believe in High Mass and Low Mass, and in the invocation of patron saints as a part of the "essential practices" of proper Christian life? Does it want our relationship with the great communions of Protestant Christendom to be shaped by men who can see nothing whatever that is good in the spiritual rebirth of the continental Reformation? Does it want the spirit of this Church interpreted by men whose conception of catholic truth is an aversion to everything which does not square with the practices of the mediaeval centuries?

If not, then the dioceses had better be careful what they do when they elect their delegates for 1922.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

In his eloquent message, which is printed on another page, Bishop Parsons presents a double question.

In the first place, he protests against the fact that the literature recently issued by the Federal Council of the Churches in connection with the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments makes no reference to the League of Nations as an existing fact. It is true that, so far as we have observed, the League of Nations is ignored in that otherwise most helpful material. There are, however, two possible explanations of this. One is that those who are responsible for the publications of the Federal Council felt the League to be of so small importance as not to be worth notice. The other possibility is that they felt that advocacy of the League of Nations as an immediate factor in an international policy which America should share would be inexpedient on account of the political partisanship which this might run foul of. We have no charter whatever to speak for the Federal Council, nor any special ability to interpret its thought, but we should believe that this second possibility points the truth. Also we can very readily understand why such a conclusion as this may have been reached. The administration which is now in power in Washington has repudiated all sympathy with the League of Nations, as that was created in the Treaty of Versailles. This administration, however, has called the conference which is now meeting in Washington. The immediate practical question is as to what can be accomplished by the conference under those conditions. The Federal Council might well have thought that the most helpful thing that the churches could do would be to bring to bear pressure along the lines in which the administration was willing to go, and not along those which, for the present at least, are barred by political reasons.

Over and above the question as to whether or not the Federal Council was wise in omitting advocacy of the League of Nations, assuming that it believed in it, there remains the greater question as to what position the public opinion of America shall now take toward the League. If that public opinion is strong enough in its favor, then the administration will have to listen. Then organizations which do not believe in it will be brought into line, and those which do believe in it can speak with unembarrassed plainness. As to the desirability of this, we absolutely agree with Bishop Parsons. Repeatedly the Southern Churchman has expressed its conviction that the League of Nations presents the one most practical hope for progress in international co-operation. We recognize the reality of the existing League, crippled though it has been by the defection of America. We feel, as Bishop Parsons does, that the most melancholy page in our national history in these recent years was the repudiation of America's world responsibility, when this nation thrust a knife into the League which its representative had been foremost in creating.

Furthermore, there seem to us unmistakable signs that America is going to be forced to enter into something which shall largely partake of the character of the present League. It is hardly conceivable that the Conference, now meeting in Washington, can let go of the problems which it has raised without some constructive and permanent method for dealing with their consequences. It is highly significant that the newspapers are now full of the report that President Harding is considering asking this conference to meet again in order that some sort of association among the peoples may be created. This is plainly a trial balloon to test the winds of public sentiment.

The administration is finding the inexorable pressure of events driving it toward international relationships which a bitter partisanship tried in vain to deny. It is no easy thing for political leaders to reverse their policies, but America will enter into some real association of the nations if the people determine that it shall. It is even possible that the present administration might enter the existing League of Nations, with certain amendments in its constitution which would reasonably save the face of consistency. The question will be settled by public opinion and by the strength of its expression. If the people of this nation make plain to their representatives in Washington that they want America to take her place in some constructive international movement, and further express their opinion that membership in the existing League is the most sensible and the most honorable choice for America to make, then there are no minor political difficulties whatsoever that can stand against that power of a people's will.

The Divine Christ the World's Need

From the Episcopal Charge of Bishop W. T. Capers, of West Texas.

The ultimate claim for the divinity of Jesus Christ rests upon the fact that from the beginning of His ministry until this present hour, He has met the need of every human heart, of whatsoever tongue or race that has appealed to Him, and has cleansed every soul that has gone to Him for cleansing. This fact accounts for the urgency of His appeal to His fellowmen, to find their peace and life in Himself. And it fully justifies His prayer that there shall be raised up to Him faithful men and women, boys and girls, who shall devote their lives to the fulfilment of His ministry. It may seem that I am urging upon your mind and conscience, a well accepted fact, namely, that Christ does meet every need of the heart and soul of man. But, my brethren, it is just here that we find the secret of the loosening of the Church's grip upon the citizenship of our nation.

A Christ other than that of the gospels is being preached. His teachings are dissolved and weakened, and in consequence His life is being withheld from the masses; as a further consequence the unshepherded people are either deserting the Church, or are striving to find a satisfaction for their souls in every imaginable theory of life and of sin. There is need today to reaffirm with clearer emphasis than ever before the doctrines of the Apostolic Church; that is, those doctrines which were enunciated by the apostles themselves who were the duly instructed and empowered witnesses of Christ. These doctrines proceed out of the truth of the Incarnation of Christ, the Son of God. If Christ is only the natural Son of Joseph and Mary, His life can differ from ours only in terms of degree. And if this be true, then the Christian religion is but one among the many guesses of life, and sin needs no cure, and heaven and hell are only the products of fancy or the last terms of a philosophy of life.

We certainly cannot philosophize away the uncompromising teaching of St. John upon this question. It was his clear and insistent differentiation as between the gospel of Christ and the philosophy of false teachers that preserved the faith in the first half of the second century A. D., Bishop Gore in his commentary upon St. John's epistles, gives this very striking note upon the first six verses of the fourth chapter of St. John's First Epistle. "As St. John looks out over the world he sees a widespread activity of false prophets. He knows that they are false and that the spirit which animates them is not of God. What is the test that he applies and would have all his brethren apply? We should have expected him, perhaps, to apply the practical test of their lives, their works, their character, but here it is the test of doctrine which he makes absolute and all-sufficient. Every spirit which acknowledges the truth of the Incarnation—which sees in Jesus the Christ, the very Son of God, made flesh —is of God. And, on the other hand, every spirit which refuseth this faith in Jesus is not of God and is a spirit of anti-Christ, such as they have heard of and can see active among them. The Christians have no cause to fear these false spirits. The power that is in them is greater than anything that is in the world. They are children of God and they have the experience of victory already. Nor have they any reason to be surprised at the popularity of anti-Christian movements. They belong to the world. It is so they speak and so they are listened to; they demand, that is, of people, no change of heart. They take them as they find them, on their own level. On the other hand, the Church comes from God, and those whose hearts God has touched—those who know God—listen to His messengers: those and those only. This acknowledgment of the truth of the Incarnation, this readiness to listen to the message of the Church, is all-sufficient to distinguish the spirit of truth from the spirit of error."

We can do no better, my dear brethren, than to accept St. John's statement of the Incarnation, as the solution of our difficulty today, and to act upon it with every determination to give to this needy world in which we live the Christ of the gospels, Who is the Christ of the masses and of the destitute and of the sinful. His heart is longing to administer life to those whom He has redeemed, and yet He is powerless except as we interpret Him in His true character to the people. In other words, Christ is not independent of the doctrines concerning His life. That this is true is seen in the fact that He, with studious method, instructed His disciples concerning His origin, His equality with God, the purpose of His ministry and its ultimate triumph. Before He commissioned St. Peter and the other apostles, He exacted of them a careful statement of their faith in Himself as the Son of God. This instruction was to be the foundation of all their future teachings, for Christ foresaw that He could only save the world, as the world was taught to believe that He was and is indeed the only begotten Son of God, the veritable Incarnation of God.

The Claims of the Ministry

To the Pastors, and Through the Pastors to the Parents and the People of the Church.

The Presiding Bishop and Council have commended to the Commission on the Ministry the matter of the presentation of the claims of the ministry on the thought and action of the Church.

It is proper to speak at the outset with thankfulness in view of the increased enrollment in all our Church seminaries. The tide seems to be turning; but the proportion of men for the ministry to the number of communicants is still far below what is needed.

The suggestion, as made to us by the Presiding Bishop and Council, that our necessity is for "consecrated, strong and well-equipped men in the ministry," lays the emphasis on quality more than on quantity, consecration of the spirit, strength of body, adequate intellectual training.

While the custom of a sermon on the Third Sunday in Advent may be wisely followed, we venture to hope that the matter and the appeal shall take on a new tone so that the response may be of the best material. It should focus previous personal work, and lead the way to further personal guidance by the parish priest.

The Commission feels that its primary function is an educative one, and that this educative work must begin with the parents and their boy, with teachers and their pupils, most of all with pastors and their people. There the law of the Church places the first responsibility. Our first duty is to make the ministry a work to be held in honor, a place it too often fails to find: in the plans of the home; in the conversation of the family table; in the teaching of the Sunday school; in the personal counsel of the pastor with his youth. In the home and in the parish the right boy is to be encouraged and the unsuitable boy stopped in starting to be a minister in the Church of Christ. The appeal may well be to the manhood, the devotion to high adventure which is inherent in youth, seen not only in the war for freedom, but in scientic exploration, in settlement work in hard places, in community service. Young men make eager response to Shackleton in the Arctic and Grenfell in the Labrador. The Commission is not of the opinion that the right sort of youth is hesitating to enter the ministry on the score of low salaries.

In the interest of this educative work for the ministry the Commission is preparing to offer to clergy and parents and youth seeking a vocation, useful literature on the nature of the ministry, the sort of men the Church needs in its ministers, how a call comes from God, the training needed for the new day.

In many dioceses a committee of one or more has been named with whom pastors and parents may confer, and to whom the approach of young men for counsel may be natural and welcome.

For the Commission, which represents some thirty leading teachers and pastors in the Church.

Harry P. Nichols,
Chairman of the Recruiting Committee of the Commission on the Ministry.

THE JEW IN THE CHURCH

By the Rev. John L. Zacker, Secretary for the Church Mission to Jews

In England. At this time, when the Presiding Bishop and Council are in touch with our National Committee on Jewish Work as to the methods of procedure, we should be acquainted somewhat with the Hebrew Christian question. A special message just received from Bishop Tuttle reads, "The Jews are a sacred people, brethren indeed of our Lord. We should not allow curselves to forget that. And we ought to do all we can to help them put away the scales from their eyes, that they may see Him to be their Brother and their own Messiah." But on account of time and space, only a bird's-eye view of the situation must suffice. England, the mother of our Church, has by no means been a step-mother to the Jew, but a real haven to the lonely Hebrew Christian. In the winter of 1811 a nobleman, Lewis Way, was riding with a friend from Exmouth to Exeter, when his attention was called to a group of oaks known as the "Oaks of La Ronde." The late Miss Parminter, on whose property they were, left a will that these trees were not to be cut down until the return of the Jews to Palestine. This striking incident impressed Lewis Way so strongly that he became a staunch and lasting friend of Israel. An organization for work among Jews and Gentiles existed in London, but after experimentation, it was found necessary to have a distinct movement for a peculiar people. Lewis Way came to the front with his energy and means, and the "London Society for Promoting Christianity Among the Jews" was established. Through his prayers and gifts, the society prospered, and men like Sir Thomas Baring, Bart., M. P., and the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury, K. G., of Jewish descent himself, became its presidents. The results, in short, were so encouraging that, beginning with royalty, all manifested interest and goodwill. The society was gradually able to employ 222 ordained, lay and medical missionaries. Thus the gospel was preached to Jewry in various portions of the world. Alexander, the first Bishop of Jerusalem, was one of the converts from Rabbinism. Also Isaak Hellmuth, afterwards Bishop of Huron Diocese, Canada, who gave freely of his large means and was a rabbinical scholar who entered the University of Breslau at the age of sixteen. Through the distribution of Bibles, Shereshewsky, who later became Bishop in China, was brought to Christ. He undertook the stupendous task of translating the Bible and Prayer Book into the Wenli dialect, thereby reaching 250,000,000 heathen souls. He was considered one of the six most learned Orientalists in the world. He practically founded St. John's College, Shanghai, and was the most potent factor in establishing St. Paul's College, Tokyo, and Boone University, China, the most widely-known institutions of learning in the Orient. Thus churches of all parts of the universe became inspired, and England is the mother of Jewish evangelization. A Jewish paper gives the personnel of 263 converts as follows: 13 lawyers, 9 physicians, 1 dentist, 4 book-sellers, 3 engineers, 6 university professors, lecturers and private teachers, 9 governesses, 11 students of the science college, 7 of various other colleges, 5 magistrates, 1 artist, 1 banker's wife, 17 manufacturers and influential members of the Bourse, 1 actress, 4 other stage players, 3 military officers, 23 clerks and bookkeepers, 37 artisans and petty tradesmen, etc. Under the circumstances, only those who know nothing about Jewish missionary accomplishment do not advocate mighty endeavors for Israel's conversion. The last century has enabled the Church to take away from Israel its very best, and rather than deny the fact, Jewish leaders lament it. When a Jew embraces Christianity, it usually means his wife and children also, which is demonstrated in the following statistics: 72,000 Jewish converts of various Reformed churches now number 120,000 with their evangelized families.

In America. Fishberg, a Jewish authority, asserts that at least 10 per cent. of mixed marriages between Hebrew and Christian results in the family being raised as Christians. This authority might have added that a big majority of these mixed marriages were made by Jews and Jewesses who directly or indirectly were influenced by Jewish missionary propaganda. In fact, in every department of Jewish life, missionary propaganda has made its way to some degree and left a Christian influence. The Jewish press is conscious of this, and constantly warns Hebrew institutions to counteract our efforts. In other words, the enlightened conception which Jewry entertains of Christianity has been aroused by Hebrew Christian agitation. American democracy and freedom have by no means caused conversions in Jewish ranks, as some theoretical Christians would have us think. The very contrary, liberty enabled Jewry to organize in this country more than in any other part of the world. As an example, New York is the hot-bed of Jewry's world-wide propaganda. Christianity is infinitely more attacked by them in America than in Russia or Germany. Jewish missionary literature, open-air meetings and other departments of the activity have forced the rabbis to study the New Testament in order to meet constant inquiries. That is how the question of Christ's Messiahship became ubiquitous in Israel.

With the pre-war flow of immigrants into western countries and the advancing attitude of inquiry on the part of the Jews belonging to the second and third generations of our citizenship, official Christendom is claiming a more scholarly attention from our brethren. The adopted and assimilated Israelite of America, unlike his ancestors, practically disregards verbal prophecy and minute fulfilment. Rather is he concerned with historical and logical confirmation of New Testament claims. Is Christianity a myth, or could Jesus have been the divine Messiah? Such and similar questions give no little concern to the thinking Jew. Whereas, rabbis of years gone by could ignore relevant interrogations with shrugs of their shoulders, it by no means satisfies the modern student of Jewish persuasion. More so than ever before, Jesus has become the burning question of the Jewish intelligensa. As an example, Bible societies count Jewish organizations as buyers of the New Testament. Whether the object is in the affirmative or negative is not particularly the point here, the fact in any case remains that Christianity is receiving serious consideration. This much, however, may be safely asserted, that St. Paul's affirmation of God's intention to provoke Jewry to jealousy finds fulfilment in recent declarations on the part of Hebrew leaders. Only in his last work Israel Zangwill calls upon the Jewish nations to take away the Jewish Jesus from the Gentiles and make Him His original self. In order to ascertain or disprove Christian claims, an American Jewish society purposes to publish a Jewish translation of the New Testament! Signs of the times, verily! The Christian Church should be alive in this regard. This is a psychological opportunity for meeting Israel's queries. Why was the New Testament written and how shall the object be accounted for? What is the subject material and does chronology permit a theory of invention? Tracts and books, from an entirely Jewish point of view, should be published by our own Church, and what a world of good could be done! When Rabbi Isaak, of Troki, constantly flaunted that the Jewish missionary as a man whose work proves Christianity a mere fallacy, Dr. Williams, a scholar from Cambridge and an intense friend of Israel, wrote a reply under title of "Christian Evidences for Jewish People." The "Jewish Quarterly Review" soon had to agree with Professor Strack, of Berlin University, that Rabbi Isaak was actually beaten. To the ordinary Christian, the Jew is to be feared in business competition and to the Church student, the Hebrew is synonymous with scholarship. Thus we over-estimate and unconsciously indulge in exaggeration. In the final analysis, truth is unconquerable. Jews, not less than Gentiles, are compelled to submit to it. Constantly Hebrews hammer at the New Testament Canon. To show them that they live in a glass house, we need but turn tables. The Old Testament Canon was fixed when Moses had been dead for thirteen hundred years and Isaiah over seven hundred. Our limited knowledge of Hillel could be condensed in three octave pages, the information of which is of a very late date. Two hundred years elapsed after his death before the Mishna was written. Hillel was dead over four hundred years before the Palestinian Gemara was committed into writing while the Babylonian, a century still later. Jews will believe all that the talmud says, and yet will reject the New Testament on the score that it was written so late! Speaking generally, Jewish arguments against Christ and Christianity are weak and can easily be overcome. We fear them not because of fact, but on account of their scholarly reputation. They are poor mortals, yea, they sin nearly as much as the Gentile, and that is why they need Christ, their Saviour and ours.

The Church Mission to Jews occupies itself with the various Jewish problems and is now endeavoring to create an interest in the cause so that Jewish missionary stations may be opened in dioceses with large Jewish populations. The Hebrew Christian Synagogue in Philadelphia is the first undertaking, and Brooklyn is also establishing a Hebrew Christian station under the leadership of Archdeacon Bambach. A mighty branch should be started in New York with nearly two million Jews. We are negotiating with the Presiding Bishop and Council as regards making our work a distinct department. The Synod of the Province of Washington took favorable action and leading bishops and clergy of our Church are working toward that end. More than any other individual in our country, Bishop Garland, President of our National Committee, constantly fosters our aims. In spite of manifold duties, he is corresponding and in touch with the proper channels which accounts for our progress. Recently he was appointed by the Presiding Bishop and Council tc investigate the Jewish missionary situation in England. Together with Bishop Gailor and Bishop Murray, he brought back a remarkable report which inspired and enthused many of our Church leaders. Thus education proves the Jewish Mission to be a great blessing. Our Church is planning and we trust to be able to demonstrate in the very near future. Meanwhile, we appeal for prayers and goodwill. Have you subscribed for the CHURCH AND SYNAGOGUE QUARTERLY? If not, please do so; it will keep you in touch with our movements and progress and enable you to understand the Jewish question. The subscription is only one dollar per year. Ten thousand dollars is immediately needed for our various departments. Will friends kindly help us? We have as yet not received a budget from the Presiding Bishop and Council, and we are facing a year full of opportunity and need. Checks can be sent to the Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, marked "For the Church Mission to Jews," or to Bishop Garland, Church House, 202 South Nineteenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa. HAVE WE FORGOTTEN THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS?

By the Rt. Rev. Edward L. Parsons, D. D.

WHAT is the matter with the Commission on International Justice and Good Will of the Federal Council of the Churches? The question is prompted by a most careful reading of the Bulletin on "The Church and a Warless World," issued by that Commission and reprinted almost in full by our own Department of Social Service. The two are admirable pamphlets. They are full of information, of stimulating suggestion and of pointed application of Christianity to the problem of armament. They help to make very vivid the world importance of the coming Conference.

But I have looked through them in vain for the slightest allusion to the one international association which really does exist for the purpose of getting rid of war, the League of Nations. There is one statement in the best political platform style that "the concrete expression of the principles stated above is the creation of a permanent Society of Nations, a World Court of Justice and Boards of Arbitration and Conciliation." In the "Creed for believers in a warless world," there is an expression of belief "in a world-wide association of nations for world peace," but the silence about the fact that such an association has actually begun is as impressive as the silence of our State Department on the same matter.

The whole discussion in the pamphlets moves on the plane of what one might call pre-war pacifism. One finds himself constantly back in the days when one hammered away on the importance of disarmament and that sort of thing because it seemed more practical than to fling visions of a "Society of Nations" before an incredulous world. But the war came; the issue of a world united for peace or a world which is merely an armed camp was made clear. The churches of America never hesitated. During the year and a half from the Armistice to the meeting of the Republican Convention nobody could doubt where they stood. Even our own delightfully cautious leaders ventured into the stream, as the Living Church, in a recent editorial covering these same matters, has reminded us. The House of Bishops, it is true, only got as far as a League of Nations, but the House of Deputies frankly and unanimously spoke of the League.

The Bulletin ignores altogether the fact that this old straw about armaments and the like had all been threshed out. American Christians had come to see clearly that in a League of Nations which meant business the solution lay. They had come to see that nationality must be made subordinate to some sort of international association. They passed resolutions. They worked and preached and taught. They had really unselfish notions of our duties to the world. Christian leaders and presumably most intelligent Christians had come to see that the primary thing was not to agree on curing this or that symptom of the disease, but to get at the disease and cure the selfish nationalism. They hailed the League of Nations as a definite concrete step towards the realization of the thing they all believed in—the unity of humanity in God.

The League of Nations was created. It functions. It has achieved, in spite of America's absence and the turbulent state of Europe which it was not created to check and for which it is in no sense responsible some definite steps towards peace. It is a part now of the world order. It is bound in with treaties. There is not one single thing which the Disarmament Conference will have before it which, if the United States were in the League, would not be one of the League's natural functions.

Now one understands the exigencies of politics. One understands how, the world situation requiring America in the League of Nations and Republican party unity requiring her out of it, make conferences such as the present one the only solution. But must Christian leaders seeking to help the cause of a wrecked world pussyfoot like politicians? Is it not possible to say even a word about the existence of this international League? Who would be offended if it was pointed out that the other nations beside whom we fought are already making some progress? One understands why Republican leaders who believe in the League of Nations cannot embarrass the administration at the present time; but does mention of the League of Nations by those who are not administration leaders and emphasis upon the beginning which the League makes of world organization in any way embarrass the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments? I have heard nothing but earnest hope in the Conference even from the most ardent supporters of the League. Are the churches going to try to hamper the League? It is not very powerful. It is not all that any one desires, but it is a great big fact in the history of men's progress towards world federation. Would it not really help if these representative bodies of the churches could express at least hope that the one thing which they had all backed a year and a half ago might ultimately take such form as to enable America to join it? Is there any reason why Christian leaders who know that real world organization is the only permanent solution of the problem of war should not point out that fact?

But there is more than that involved. Those pamphlets have much to say of sefilsh nationalism, and they ask some "searching questions" about our own attitude. The point is well taken; but why should representatives of the churches ignore one of the most conspicuous examples of selfish nationalism in our national history? One dreadful and outstanding fact of the last two years is the growth of that spirit in America. The slogans that have come into use, the "America first," the "100 per cent. American," the exaltation of our own conscience as unfailingly to be trusted, these are but symptoms of a deep-seated disease. And this nationalism found its immediate focus and expression in the controversies over the League of Nations, and its final form in the treaty with Germany in which America gets everything and gives nothing. That the covenant with reservations which would have made it acceptable to the bulk of the American people would have been ratified if it had not been for a very small group who preached nationalism is unquestioned. Political hatreds, jealousies, distrust, all played their part, but in the end a narrow and selfish nationalism won out. The churches preached one thing; the politicians another. Even if one grants the highest motives everywhere, the thing cannot be denied. America is out of the League of Nations because some Americans feared for her sovereignty. Forty-eight other nations were not afraid. America was.

Why should these Bulletins not make use of this material which lies at hand? Of course, every Christian wants the Conference to be a success. Of course, every Christian knows it may go a long way towards peace. But two years ago every Christian in America knew, or thought he knew, that the most important step was the big step of getting the nations together in a real league. Is it necessary to ignore that and to ignore what has been accomplished in order to make the Conference a success? If so, why?

May God guide and inspire the deliberations of the Conference. We all pray that. But we may be permitted to add, May God have mercy on the Christians of America and stiffen their backbones.

AVERAGE OF CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. Editor: Looking over the "Year Book of the Churches, 1920," edited by Stacy R. Warburton for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America (Revell Co.), one finds among the Religious Statistics, pp. 197-202, that the membership of our Church during 1919 was 1,065,825, and total expenditures, $22,509,942. The average for the year then is $21 per member, or about 40 cents a week! Reference to the Living Church Almanac for 1921, p. 449, suggests that these figures are correct and that "members" are communicants.

But on the same pages of the Year Book we find for the Baptists an average per year of about $6 per member (Northern Convocation, $12; Southern, $6); Congregationalists, $15; Lutherans, $10; M. E. Church., $10; M. E. Church, South, $8; Presbyterian Church in U. S. A., $18; Presbyterian Church, South, $15; Roman Catholic Church, $4.50; Adventist, $21; Seventh Day Adventist, 9-; Jews, $15; "all denominations," $7. "The membership figures, with the exception of Roman Catholics and Jews, are on the same basis, communicants only."

Can these figures be correct? Who will interpret them?

PERCY FOSTER HALL.

St. Paul's Rectory, Alexandria, Va., Nov. 14, 1921.

(We suppose the figures given are correct, for the other religious bodies, as well as our own, so far as accurate statistics can be gathered. For a number of years the average of contributions per communicant in our Church has increased. In 1916 it was approximately $18.50, and in 1918, $20.

But the figures given by our correspondent are not as favorable to us as would seem at first glance. We suppose ours is the wealthiest Church in proportion to its membership in America. It has probably a larger constituency of adherents who are contributors, but not communicants, than any other. It spends more proportionately upon itself, its buildings and the accessories of public worship than other Protestant Churches. In missionary giving we suspect that several other churches, notably the Presbyterians, far surpass us.—Ed. S. C.)

PROPORTIONATE GIVING.

Mr. Editor: The Nation-Wide Campaign is providing this year for a special pledge card, committing the signer to the designation of a definite proportion of his income for God's uses, on the principle of the tithe. The following quotation from an old letter may perhaps serve this cause. Its writer, Mr. Louis A. Cazenove, was visiting his uncle, his father's brother, in Switzerland in 1830. His father, to whom the letter is addressed, was Anthony Charles Cazenove, who had come to America in 1794 to escape the savagery of Robespierre, and had established himself in Alexandria, Va., becoming one of the town's leading citizens. He has left numerous descendants, with some of whom I am related by marriage. One of them has recently sent me a large number of the letters that passed between father and son between the years 1824 and 1835, covering the period of Louis' early manhood. They are models of filial affection and reverence and of simple, manly Christian character. The son, who was at this time about twenty-five years old, had been distressed to see his uncle's life made miserable by petty cares in connection with his Swiss farm, and after speaking of this, he continues:

"I mention, my dear father, these little troubles of my uncle, that you may profit by them, for we see much clearer in others than in ourselves. Let me adjure you to take with more resignation to the will of God not only the small, but likewise the great misfortunes which will happen; let us grieve never so much about them; and I verily believe they will arrive the oftener the more they grieve us. * * * Misfortunes of every kind and losses in business are real blessings when rightly improved—when looked upon as coming from the hand of a Father for our good. They only become misfortunes when we suffer them to grieve us. * * * I have sometimes feared that the losses which you have been called upon to meet have been because a sufficient part of your substance had not been set aside for the needy part of our fellow-creatures or for the advancement of God's glory in other ways. This is a serious matter. * * * That what we have was given us for the good of others as well as ourselves there is no doubt. We are nothing but stewards to whom God has committed a part of His property, and He will assuredly call all of us to account for the manner in which we have employed it. For my part, I desire never to be rich, and if God grant me grace to fulfil good resolutions, I shall endeavor through life, conscientiously to determine what part of what I may have shall be set aside for God's use and scrupulously so to employ it. I really believe that a too-great concern about the things of time may generally be traced to a degree of doubt as to the existence of a future life. At least I so trace it in myself, and when I feel most persuaded of this great truth it is then that I feel the greatest contempt for worldly riches, honors, etc. * * * I long to see you enjoying some rest which will leave your mind free to attend more to your spiritual concerns."

Mr. Cazenove was throughout a long life a devout communicant of Christ Church, Alexandria, applying in his own life most faithfully the principles which he so remarkably sets forth here in writing to his own father, "and he being dead, yet speaketh."

THE EMBER DAYS.

A correspondent wishes to know "why, in the Ember Days, one day (Thursday) is skipped?"

We have examined seven or eight authorities on the Prayer Book, all we have access to at the moment, and cannot find the answer to this question. So we can only give our own surmise; which is that in the early Church, Thursday, being the day of our Lord's Ascension, was considered a festival day of the week. Wednesday, the day on which the betrayal of Christ was bargained for, as well as Friday, the day of the Crucifixion, were appropriate days of fasting. (Compare the "Litany days.") Saturday also was thus observed as a sort of vigil or day of preparation for the Sunday festival. So these days would naturally be adopted for the quarterly fasts (Jejunia quatuor temporum, or Fasts of the Four Seasons), which were of very early origin and were associated with the four seasons of the year, falling near the beginning of each. It was later that the stated times for ordinations were fixed on the Sundays following these quarterly fasting days, with the result that they have since become, with the entire week in which they fall, seasons of special prayer "for those who are to be admitted to Holy Orders."

SEMINARIES BACK TO PRE-WAR ATTENDANCE RECORD.

A report of the present enrolment in the theological seminaries has been received from all except the Bishop Payne Divinity School. Reckoning the number at that school the same as last year, the present total in all the seminaries is three hundred and fifty. Last year's total was two hundred and forty-four.

The figures for last year are those reported by the Department of Religious Education, and were about one-third less than those for the year before the war, 1915-16. As this year's gain almost equals that third, the seminaries are virtually back to their pre-war attendance records.

The numbers of students at the various seminaries are shown in the following table:

	Last Year.	This Year.
General	70	93
Cambridge	11	19
Berkeley	14	13
Philadelphia	20	21*
Virginia	40	60
Sewanee	12	16
Bexley Hall	5	12
Nashotah	11	40
Western	15	15
Seabury	20	20
Pacific	11	7
Bishop Payne	11	11#
Greeley	4	23

*Graduate enrolment not complete.

Synod of the Province of Washington in Session in Wilmington, Del.

The meeting of the sixtn annual Synod of the Province of Washington was welcomed to Wilmington by Mayor Harvey and Governor Denney, of Delaware, as well as by the Bishop of the Diocese.

The opening service was preached by Dr. James E. Freeman, of Epiphany Church, Washington, D. C., who took the place of Bishop Thomas F. Gailor, the latter being called home by the illness of his wife.

Holy Communion was celebrated at the opening service, and there were in attendance fifteen bishops and more than one hundred clerical and lay delegates.

Dr. Freeman referred eloquently to the work of the Disarmament Conference, and a memorial was adopted and forwarded to Washington expressing gratitude to the President for calling the Conference, and congratulations over the progress already made.

There is a strong feeling throughout the Church that the provincial system is not as efficient as it should be by reason of the lack of legislative powers vested in the Synods, which now amount merely to an expression of opinion, or, as one Bishop put it, to a "talk-fest."

This feeling was referred to by Bishop Brown in his opening address, and no doubt it will receive attention at the General Convention next year.

The wastefulness of time taken in Synods in discussions of unimportant matters was brought up by Rev. George G. Bartlett, who cited the fact that upwards of fifty resolutions were passed at the last meeting, few of which were of any value, in Mr. Bartlett's opinion. He suggested that a Steering Committee be appointed.

The following resolution was adopted on motion of Rev. R. W. Trapnell and Bishop Garland:

"That immediate steps be taken to inform the authorities of the Turkish Empire that the long sufferings of the Christian nations have reached its limits. and that action be taken by the representatives of the nations in Washington, or if that be not possible, then by the governments of the United States and Great Britain to permanently relieve the intolerable condition in Armenia and secure its absolute freedom from Turkish control or influence."

The resolution further pledged its support to the invaluable work of the Near East Relief, and offered the prayer that success should crown the efforts of the President in behalf of the oldest Christian nation. Bishop Brown named Bishop Garland, Bishop Harding and Mr. Trapnell as a committee to present the resolution to President Harding.

The importance of raising sufficient money to provide for a Social Survey of the Province was voiced by Bishop Harding on Thursday, but no definite action was taken. A resolution providing for the appointment of a Foreign-Born American Commission was adopted. This Commission is to be composed of one representative from each of the dioceses in the province.

A summary of the work of the Conference on Social Service held in Milwaukee last year was given by the Rev. Paul S. Atkins. In this connection Deaconess Williams spoke earnestly and enthusiastically of Christian Social Service in a coal mining town, where such efforts are exceptional indeed.

At a joint session held on Thursday afternoon with representatives from the various women's sections, a memorial was adopted recommending to the Presiding Bishop and Council that in view of its fifty years of faithful service, the Woman's Auxiliary remain intact as to its organization and scope of work, and further, that the resolution be submitted to the Commission now considering the status of the Woman's Auxiliary.

At the final service in St. Andrew's Church, Dr. Clifford G. Twombly spoke on the Church Militants' New Task. He made some constructive suggestions, which marked his address as one of the best during the session.

An invitation to meet in Washington in 1923 was extended and accepted. There will be no meeting next year, owing to the assembling of the General Convention in October.

Great appreciation was expressed by all the delegates for the bountiful hospitality of the Wilmington Church people.

Help! Help!

October receipts to apply on the General Quota were $95,345.94 less than those of October, 1920, a decrease of more than 36 per cent. The total receipts of the year to date are $85,710.51 less than for the same period last year. At one time we were nearly $200,000 ahead. What is the matter? Business is generally better now than in May, when our income was at its peak.

Only two months left in which to make up the loss. All together, now! !

Yours for a plus sign by December 31st.

LEWIS B. FRANKLIN,
Treasurer.

Sunday-School Opportunities in Europe

Throughout Europe conditions are unusually favorable for aggressive Sunday school work. That is the report which was presented to the Executive Committee of the World's Sunday School Association which met at the Union League Club, New York, October 27, by James W. Kinnear, chairman, and W. C. Pearce, associate secretary of the World's Association. These men had just completed a Sunday school tour of Great Britain and the continent, which began on August 13. They visited, together or separately, England, Scotland, Wales, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, Switzerland, Germany, Austria and Czecho-Slovakia. Everywhere the heartiest welcome was accorded these representatives of the organized Sunday school work. While there are differences of opinion on political questions, bitterness growing out of the racial question increased by the war and distress caused by the general economic disturbances, all the leaders who were in conference declared that the religious training of the youth is absolutely essential. They welcomed all the co-operation which might come through the World's Sunday School Asscciation.

Some of the meetings were real unity gatherings. At the Kristiana conference the presiding officer was a State Church clergyman, but since that meeting the State Church and the Free Church leaders met and unitedly named him, Rev. K. O. Kornelius, as Norway's representative on the World's Executive Committee. In Germany the Landis Kirche and Free Church Sunday school leaders met together for the first time. In Prague all the churches were represented, including the newly elected Bishop of the new Church organized by the 900,000 who have separated themselves from the Roman Catholic Church. In every place there was a strong sense of the need of unity of Christian forces in order to win all the youth of today, who will be the men of tomorrow.

In all the countries visited it was learned that the Sunday school work had been steadily prosecuted during the war, and in Scandinavia there had been an actual increase in membership. The growing attitude towards separation of Church and State is throwing a much greater responsibility upon the Church for the religious training of the world's childhood and youth. The Church leaders are ready to adopt a most aggressive program and are seeking additional leadership for the constructive and educational work now so clearly recognized as essential.

GOD IS WORKING HIS PURPOSES OUT.

God is working His purpose out,
As year succeeds to year:
God is working His purpose out,
And the time is drawing near;
Nearer and nearer draws the time,
The time that shall surely be,
When the earth shall be filled with the glory of God
As the waters cover the sea.

All we can do is nothing worth,
Unless God blesses the deed;
Vainly we hope for the harvest-tide,
Till God gives life to the seed;
Yet nearer and nearer draws the time,
The time that shall surely be,
When the earth shall be filled with the glory of God
As the waters cover the sea.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

MOVING IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION.

A very helpful Conference on Inter-racial Relations was held in Richmond, Va., during November.

Dr. W. W. Alexander, who is one of the leaders in this movement for better feeling between the races through more equitable treatment of the negroes in matters of education, traveling accommodations and living conditions, was one of the speakers.

The women of the Conference adopted the following resolutions:

"Realizing that responsibility follows opportunity, we are deeply sensible of the greatness of the task confronting us, and would approach it in the spirit of humility and dependence upon God.

Reviewing world conditions, we are confronted by nations in conflict, due largely to increased race consciousness, and we of the South find ourselves face to face with a new period of adjustment.

We deplore any conditions in our midst that tend to widen the breach between peoples whose circumstances have thrown together and whose destinies are inevitably interwoven in our own and coming generations. We believe righteousness, justice, peace and good will can be established between races of different colors. We accept this challenge in the spirit of the Golden Rule and pledge our whole-hearted support to the educational movements now sweeping over the entire South for better racial conditions, human liberty and preservation of the ideals upon which this government is founded. To this end we suggest the following:

1. That we strive to bring our women to a better understanding of the opportunity at our doors by a more intelligent study of negro life in the home, in the school and in the church, to the end of deepening the public conscience as touching our responsibility to our negro neighbors.

2. That we emphasize the fact that no community is stronger than its weakest link, and that therefore in matters of education, public health, child welfare, recreation and general living conditions, more adequate provision be made for the negro.

3. Because we believe the public press to be a potent factor for the promotion of wholesome race relationships, we urge that the achievements of the negro be emphasized rather than his delinquencies, and to this end pledge our personal influence.

4. That we stand uncompromisingly against lawlessness in all forms, for the administration of justice through the regular constituted channels, and not by self-constituted bodies for which there is no place in our midst. We pledge ourselves to uphold the hands of our officials in maintenance of the law.

Finally, believing that public sentiment is our greatest asset in bringing about all progress and reform, and because women through the home and social life are a great factor in creating the same, we commend to ourselves and our sister women the part we are privileged to play in developing such a sentiment in Virginia as will tend to the realization of this program."

THE CHURCH IN THE COMMUNITY.

The following comes to us as a result of the Inter-church World Survey:

"While writers and speakers, both learned and unearned, have been making capital of the failure of the Church to do this or that, there has been developing a type of ministry which refutes much of the criticism that these closet philosophers have used to sharpen the witicisms of their thesis. It is the Church House, an institution almost entirely of our own generation, set in the midst of communities most needing its manifold services, whether in residential sections or the shifting down-town populations, in industrial centers or where all the adults talk an alien tongue.

The Service Rendered, Not the Building, Counts.

It is true that some of the buildings serving as Church Houses will not stand the test of those who measure with foot rule and questionnaire. But schoolhouses, libraries, town halls and lodge rooms fail to measure up to the best that could be. Many Church Houses are merely an adaptation of the old church building for a new type of ministry. The Bethlehem Congregational Church in St. Louis, Mo., has a most dreary building for Church House work, but it is teaching adult Bohemians English so that they may understand their children, and the children Bohemian so that what father and mother say to them may be grasped. Among the Mexicans of Azuza, Cal., the Presbyterian Church conducts a Church House in a bungalow with two large front rooms, a dining-room, kitchen, two bedrooms with bath between on a lot 100 by 150 feet. Yet here come the Mexican men, mostly toilers at the seasonal tasks of orange picking, and walnut and olive gathering, to study English and the ways of American citizenship. And their wives forsake their squalid one and two-room homes to learn the art of home-making with the rooms of the Church House as demonstration. And the 1,200 people of Sargent, Col., come together from their twelve square mile territory to make a Community Church out of their fine consolidated schoolhouse.

There are, however, Church Houses built for the purpose signified by the name. A Baptist minister got one started in Dimick, Pa., an American farming community, by holding a 'bee' for the digging and constructing of a small cellar. And with his own hands he began the actual building of the Church House with donated lumber, for which act he was rebuked by some who reminded him that 'he had been called to preach and not to serve as a carpenter.' But that was yesterday. Today the entire community use the Church House for gymnasium, basket and indoor baseball court, and for banquets, and social, civic and political affairs. It has served to foster civic pride and increase Christian friendliness.

Central Methodst Episcopal Church, Detroit, Mich., has a Church House which was built to house practically every activity that such an institution could carry on. It is excellently adapted for a modern program of religious education, has a gymnasium and bowling alley, and there is a sewing class with machines and various appliances for mending and pressing, which are put at the disposal of business women. Club rooms and social rooms abound, and there is a crowd using the building at all times. The staff consists of pastor, assistant pastor and three specially trained workers.

No Longer a One-Man Job.

But whether it be the Cathedral Mission of the Good Samaritan, established by the Episcopal Church in a polyglot section of San Francisco, Cal., after the great fire, whose clinic ministers to the eyes and ears of the children of the tannery, steel mill and factory workers; or renders surgical aid to the workers themselves; or the Washington Park Community Church in a residential section of Denver, Col., composed of eleven different denominations and set to organize the leisure time of its young people, this new venture in kingdom service has startled the Church of Jesus Christ to see the need of a specialized, diversified ministry.

No longer can the pastor do all that the Church plans to do. The Church House has demonstrated this as perhaps nothing else could do. For when an institution aims to bring people together for social intercourse or to augment the recreational life of the neighborhood or community with a program of gymnastics, athletics, bowling and similar activities, no one man can do it. And when added to this is all that helpfulness given in intellectual, manual or industrial training that ranges all the way from plain sewing to arts and crafts and from classes in English to University Extension Courses, and an intelligently organized and consistently executed program of Biblical and religious education and activity, the need of a staff is apparent.

And the staff has evolved. Not all in one Church House or in one denomination. But out of all that is being done, the church staff has grown from one man to several specially trained co-laborers. With the pastor now minister the associate pastor and assistant pastor. And behold the office secretary, the church assistant and the pastor's assistant! There are directors of religious education, of community work, of playground, of work for men and boys, of work for women and girls, of children's work, of the Church House, of music, of crafts school and scout master. The deaconess is broadening her work. And there is the Church visitor, the Sunday school visitor, the parish worker, the social secretary, the club secretary, the mothers' secretary, the social worker and the welfare worker. And shall the librarian not be counted? And the kindergartner, the matron and assistant matron of the house? Or the day nursery matron, the cafeteria workers and the trained nurse? And who would omit mention of the engineer and that most necessary officer, the janitor?

Church of England News

Church Finance.

The problem of Church finance is becoming increasingly acute in the Church of England, and it is being recognized that the National Assembly will have a serious situation to face when it meets in November. The editor of the Guardian observes that the Assembly will be faced with a long program of business in which finance must necessarily be predominant, and the prospect in regard to finance is far from cheerful. "The one most vital and pressing necessity," comments the editor, "is the redemption of the existing clergy and the clergy of the future from disabling poverty. This done, we shall be able to look hopefully forward to other work."

It is interesting to note that the only really practical scheme that has been suggested for remedying the existing state of things is the Duplex Envelope System. This system, which has been generally adopted in American churches, is still looked upon as something of a novelty in the English Church. It would seem that in all there are only 391 English parishes which have tried the scheme, but these have met with such splendid success that there is likelihood of a more general adoption of the plan.

Bishop of Zanzibar and Reunion.

It was a matter for great rejoicing when the Bishop of Zanzibar endorsed the Lambeth Appeal on Reunion, as a member of the committee. Unfortunately, the Bishop has recently written to the Archbishop of Canterbury, requesting that his name may be removed from the list of Bishops who receive invitations to the Lambeth Conference and share in a representation on its Consultative Committee. Dr. Weston has taken this step on the ground that the Bishop of Manchester, Dr. Temple, had invited several non-conformist ministers to preach in his Diocese during Advent. Dr. Weston thinks that this is a contravention of the resolution of the Lambeth Conference which contemplates the use of Anglican pulpits only by those who are sufficiently in sympathy with the Anglican position as to make reunion possible with East and West alike. He claims that the Free Church leaders have refused to acknowledge the Episcopal nature of the Church, and are not prepared to accept the Creed in a really Catholic sense. The Archbishop of Canterbury has gently suggested that the Bishop of Zanzibar has misunderstood the Convocation resolution upon which the Bishop of Manchester seems to have acted, and that distance from the scene has caused misapprehension. At the same time the Bishop of Zanzibar's most influential friends in the press are inclined to think that he has been hasty in thus endeavoring to cut himself away from the central councils of the Church.

St. Martin's-in-the-Fields Anniversary.

On November 11, Armistice Day, the present Church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields attained the two hundredth anniversary of its foundation. Since St. Martin's was the parish church of the Sovereigns of England, George I was church warden for a time and presented the organ often played upon by Purcell and Handel. The original Church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields was mentioned as far back as 1222 in a Westminster Boundary Commission Report. The registers relating to this church contain many historical records, including the baptism of Charles II and Francis Bacon, the marriage of Cromwell's daughter, the burials of Robert Boyle, George Heriot and Nell Gwyn. In 1687 occurred at St. Martin's the last instance known in England of claiming sanctuary.

The Guardian makes the following interesting comment upon the anniversary: "St. Martin's-in-the-Fields has long been an historic church, but unlike many more or less venerable institutions, it continues to make history. * * * Rooted in the past—for the existing church occupies the site of a far more ancient predecessor—St. Martin's is typical of what the English Church should be—respectful of the past, yet nervously alive to the present, and stretching out its hands to the future. It is the most 'live' church in London. Its services are packed, and it is open day and night, ever ready to welcome the happy and soothe the wretched. Had it ever been open in those days, David Copperfield would probably have met Martha and Mr. Peggotty during the search for Emily inside instead of on the steps. Mr. Sheppard and his staff are successfully solving the problem of what to do with empty churches. 'Fill them' is their solution."

Double Consecration at St. Paul's.

In St. Paul's Cathedral on the Festival of All Saints the Rev. Harrington C. Lees, D. D., late vicar of Swansea, and the Very Rev. St. J. B. Wynne-Willson, D. D., late dean of Bristol, were consecrated Archbishop of Melbourne and Bishop of Bath and Wells respectively.

Churchmen of New York Studying Unemployment Situation

More Hygienic Methods Urged for Public Schools.

The enterprise of the Diocesan Social Service Commission brought more than one hundred Church clergy together at luncheon on a recent Monday to discuss unemployment. Bishop Manning presided. Experts from employment and similar agencies spoke. Miss Van Kleeck, of the Sage Foundation, whom President Harding invited to attend his conference on the same subject, said:

"Unemployment is not so much a matter of individuals as it is the inadequacy of individuals. The Church has the opportunity of holding up a true vision for all the people, although the Church has been playing too much into the hands of those who are afraid of experts. The first thing to consider in unemployment is what the man needs, and then determine what is best in communal interests." She criticized the incident in St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie on Sunday, when a French Canadian veteran, a Quebec tailor, was made the object of an appeal for overcoats for the jobless by Urbain Ledoux. Miss Van Kleeck said the tailor should have stayed at his trade in Canada and not have come to this city to keep some other man out of a job.

A director of a local agency to improve conditions of the poor said the Church can be of greatest assistance in maintaining permanent and not spasmodic efforts, co-operating with existing agencies rather than setting up their own, and especially by influence with employers who are church members to give consideration to merit and mix religion with business. Secretary Gates, of the Charities Bureau, and Secretary Mansfield, of the Seaman's Institute, urged that married men be first considered, and that sailors are not of necessity stranded merely because they are sailors. A major of the Seventh Field Artillery, speaking of Ledoux's overcoat incident, declared there to be no excuse for one man giving up his overcoat to another. He would furnish not only overcoat, but entire outfit, good pay, good food, a chance to gain a trade, all if men were willing to enlist in Uncle Sam's service. He could provide five hundred with such opportunity at once.

On the whole, the conclusions were that employment is on the mind to some extent in New York, that the Church could help if it could find a way to do so, and that the Commission be left to find the way.

Speaking at Ascension Church forum, Dr. Woods Hutchinson attacked the present public school plan of keeping children indoors four to six hours for study and recitation, and said that two hours are ample. Other time he would devote to recreation, to play in parks, to sight-seeing. He would have all school exercises in the forenoon, and then would make teachers into leaders of study of the world as it is—nature, insects, pictures, traffic, all of the many activities of real life. He argued that the greatest educational facilities are not in books, but in people, and people in action. Such course of study and training is not only best for education, but best for the brain, the nerves, and body of children.

"The happy and normal development of the child is to be found only in the outdoor life and the play of growing youth. How can the boy and girl develop naturally when they are put on a straight-back chair—such a chair or bench as may only be found in the average schoolroom—and then put a book in his hand and tell him to keep still?

"The victim's physical being resists. He squirms and twists and his muscles fight against this confinement. His brain is affected by it, and finally he ceases to think at all."

JAPANESE LEADERS LISTEN TO NEW YORK CLERGYMAN.

When Harry Emerson Fosdick, D. D., of Union Theological Seminary and the First Presbyterian Church, New York, was in Japan recently, a special function was arranged by H. E. Coleman, Sunday School Secretary for Japan representing the World's Sunday School Association. The meeting was held in the Imperial Hotel, Tokyo, and seventy-five Japanese leaders attended, though the subject of the address by Dr. Fosdick had been announced as "The Christian Interpretation of Life." Among those present were Prince Tokugawa, President of the House of Peers; Viscount Shibusawa, banker and philanthropist; Baron Sakatani, former Mayor of Tokyo; Baron Goto, present Mayor of Tokyo; Baron Konda, of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha; Baron Morimura, a prominent merchant; Mr. Yoshizawa, of the Foreign Office; Dr. Doyeda, Vice-President of the League of Nations Society; Mr. Okubo, once Governor of Formosa; and other men of equal prominence. Dr. Fosdick said it was the largest group of such prominent people that he had ever addressed. The message of the speaker was quoted at length in the Japanese papers.

Church Intelligence

What Will the Church Do About It?

At the November meeting of the trustees of the American Church Building Fund Commission applications for loans amounting to $37,766.50 were recorded as approved by the Committee on Loans. On account of the use by the Church of the entire fund available for loans, future dates, running well in 1922, have been assigned to these loans in their order on the waiting list, and the dates have been accepted by the applicants. The fund, having now become a revolving fund to be loaned, returned and loaned again, this procedure must be adopted for the future, and until the fund is increased by the generous gifts and offerings of the Church and by legacies. Announcement was made that loans immediately needed and aggregating $200,000 had been necessarily declined because of lack of funds since the September meeting of the Board. The future operation of the fund will be in a turn-over of its capital, as the same is returned from loans now outstanding.

Applications for gifts from eight parishes and missions in the sum of $3,625 were approved at this meeting. The Commission will be able to continue its system of gifts and grants, which are made from the income received from the capital now invested in Church loans.

Further steps were taken through the appointment of a special committee to secure the sympathetic and practical interest of Church people in this fund so widely useful and yet so inadequate to meet the applications for help which are continually received.

Brotherhood Field Secretary Completes Visitation of Chapters in Diocese of Virginia.

Mr. Edward A. Shields Field Secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, left Richmond a short time ago, after completing the visitation of all chapters in the Diocese. The fact that a field man sent out from the National Office stirs up interest and lends new life to a local organization is attested to by the following extract from a letter recently written to Brotherhood headquarters by a prominent Churchman of Richmond:

"Mr. Shields did wonderful work while here, and the men and boys were carried away with him. He is a splendid speaker and strikes right at the heart. From the effects of his visit and from the Norfolk Convention things are going along here in great shape. Several Junior chapters have been organized and some dormant chapters have taken on new life.

Mr. Shields worked very hard while here. Often he had as many as two and three meetings an evening, as every one seemed anxious to have him. He addressed the Clericus and all the clergymen thought well of him. He was invited to address the Convocation. I have never known a man to make such an impression as he did in the short time he was here. A luncheon was tendered him before he left, and the men crowded around him as though they had known him all their lives and hated to see him leave. I feel that it did everybody good to have him here."

NORTH CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Morrison Bethea has accepted the call of the Bishop to be Archdeacon of Raleigh, and will take up his work as such the first of the year. Mr. Bethea, in giving up St. Timothy's Church, Wilson, is leaving one of the strong parishes of the Diocese.

The Rev. Robert E. Gribbin has received a most cordial welcome at St. Paul's Church, Winston-Salem. Already he has made a host of friends, and St. Paul's Church is responding splendidly to his leadership.

The Rev. Dr. William Way, rector of Grace Church, Charleston, S. C., preached the University sermon at Chapel Hill on November 20 upon the invitation of the faculty.

The Rev. E. W. Baxter, of Warrenton, declined a call to a much larger work in another Diocese. Mr. Baxter first decided to go, but so much pressure was brought to bear upon him by the whole community, as well as his own church, that he reconsidered and declined.

The Rev. C. A. Ashby, of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Raleigh, preached the opening sermon at the meeting of the Wilmington Convocation in the Diocese of East Carolina last week.

The Rev. E. A. Penick, Jr., of St. Peter's Church, Charlotte, is in charge of the Nation-Wide Campaign in the Diocese this fall.

The Rev. Lewis N. Taylor, of Roanoke Rapids, has declined a call extended him by a Virginia parish.

The Rev. Sanford L. Rotter has resigned his work at Monroe and Hamlett to go to The Plains, Va. He expects to move about the first of the year.

The E. A. Osborne Cottage, at the Thompson Orphanage, Charlotte, is about completed. It will provide for twenty-four babies, and was named for the Rev. E. A. Osborne, of Charlotte, a life-time supporter and friend of the Orphanage.

EAST CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

The Convocation of Wilmington.

The Rev. William H. Milton, Executive Secretary of the Department of the Nation-Wide Campaign, and the Rev. C. A. Ashby, prominent leader of the Diocese of North Carolina, were the chief speakers at the fall meeting of the Convocation of Wilmington, which met with St. Matthew's Church, Maxton, November 15 and 16. The "Church's Mission to the Negro" was the subject of a most interesting address delivered by the Rev. E. H. Goold, rector of St. Augustine's School, Raleigh, N. C.

The services and business meetings of this session of Convocation were of a high order, and there was good attendance. The Rev. A. R. Parshley, rector of St. Paul's Church, Clinton, is dean of the Convocation. The women's meetings, held at the same time, were presided over by Mrs. S. P. Adams, of Wilmington, and among the speakers were Bishop Darst, Mr. Noe, Mrs. A. M. Waddell, Mrs. M. S. Gielow and Miss Rena Harding. The main topic of discussion at all of the meetings was the 1922 program of the Church. On Wednesday evening an inspirational service was held in the Maxton Presbyterian Church, St. Matthew's Chapel being too small to accommodate the congregation. Dr. Milton, Bishop Darst and Archdeacon Alexander Miller were the speakers.

The Centennial Pageant, "The Mission of the Church," was rendered with great effectiveness in three of the churches in Wilmington. Two of the Wilmington clergy, the Rev. Messrs. J. E. W. Cook and Alexander Miller, took two of the speaking parts. The three churches in which the pageant was given were St. John's, St. James' and the Church of the Good Shepherd. At each presentation people had to be turned away. The impression created by the pageant was distinctively and deeply spiritual.

The Rev. A. R. Parshley, rector of St. Paul's Church, Clinton, was appointed by Governor Morrison, of North Carolina, as one of the three veterans of the World War to represent the State at the funeral of the Unknown Soldier on Armistice Day. Mr. Parshley, not having been priested when war was declared, enlisted as a private in the ranks and went to France. His selection for this honor was greatly appreciated by his brother clergy of the Diocese.

A preaching mission was begun in St. Thomas' Church, Windsor, on Sunday, November 20. The Rev. W. R. Noe, Executive Secretary of the Diocese, is the preacher. Mr. Noe is a former rector of the parish, and is much beloved.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

An Appreciation.

In the death of the Rev. Arthur S. Johns, the Diocese of Washington lost one of her most honored clergy. Mr. Johns was one of that devoted group of men who, having served in the Confederate Army, after the end of the war entered the Virginia Seminary to prepare for enlistment in the ranks of the sacred ministry.

He was the son of one of Virginia's most beloved and distinguished Bishops, and, like his father, he possessed more than ordinary ability as a preacher. In all his contact with other men he was always the Christian gentleman. He was distinctly a man of peace; and often relinquished his rights and privileges, rather than contend for them. He was sunshiny and bright in disposition, and was gifted with such a saving and keen sense of humor as to frequently remind one of Bishop Wilmer. Had he been less retiring and modest in disposition, his abilities would have had wider recognition. As it was, he was the honored Secretary of the Diocese of Washington for twenty-four years, and a number of times he was sent as a deputy to the General Convention. Large numbers of those to whom he ministered in Delaware, Virginia, Maryland and Washington, and of his brethren in the ministry, will rise up to call his memory blessed. Those who knew him best loved him most.

Nativity Chapel Observes Anniversary.

The eighteenth anniversary of the founding of the Nativity Chapel was celebrated on Sunday, November 21, at the morning service. The chapel was started by the Rev. Enoch M. Thompson, under the direction of Bishop Satterlee, in 1903, in a six-room house at Seventeenth and East Capitol Streets. Mr. Thompson was, at the time, assistant at St. Paul's Church, and gave Sunday afternoons to this mission work for five years. In 1908 the present Chapel of the Nativity was erected at Fourteenth and A Streets, Southeast. Later a temporary parish hall was built, and now the congregation is planning to build a large parish house on the east of the church building. The work has grown steadily since Mr. Thompson first undertook it, and has now as a part of its work the Chapel of the Resurrection, at Fifteenth and G Streets, Northeast. This chapel was one of those designated by the late Samuel Philips, as one of those which the convention of the Diocese should build under his legacy for the erection of mission chapels.

Work Begun on McKim Memorial.

Work on the McKim memorial tower is well under way, and though this will involve several important changes in the main church building, the church services will not be interrupted by the work according to the plans of those in charge.

At Epiphany noon-day services in the interest of the Conference on Limitation of Armaments will be held every day as long as the Conference lasts. Speakers are announced from day to day through the daily papers. These services were requested by many who felt that this down-town church should logically be open at this time for those who wanted to come in for a few minutes of a busy day and pray for the success of this great Conference.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Teaching Mission: Bishop Rhinelander and Dr. Bernard Iddings Bell, president of St. Stephen's College, are conducting a Teaching Mission, beginning Wednesday, St. Andrew's Day, in the Pro-Cathedral of St. Mary. The Bishop has charge Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings. On Monday evening, December 5, President Bell will take charge. His subject will be, "The Christian Religion in the Language of Today."

Diocesan Day of Intercession Observed: Under the auspices of the Church Service League of the Diocese, Wednesday, St. Andrew's Day, was observed as a Diocesan Day of Intercession by all women's organizations in St. Mark's Church.

From 10:30 until 12 and from 1 to 5 P. M. each organization had a fifteen-minute period while the congregation prayed for that particular organization. The following diocesan and national societies, which compose the Church Service League, was represented: Woman's Auxiliary, Foreign Committee, Committee on Colored Missions, Domestic Committee, Diocesan Committee, Indian Committee, United Thank Offering, St. Barnabas' Guild (nurses), Daughters of the King, Girls' Friendly Society, Diocesan Altar Guild, Mission Study Class, Diocesan Supply Bureau and Church Mission of Help.

The $20,000 Skinner organ, recently installed in Grace Church, Mount Airy, the Rev. Thomas S. Cline, rector, had its first trial Wednesday evening, November 30, when William E. Zench, an organist of Boston, gave a recital. The organ, whch is the only one of its type in Philadelphia, has an electro-pneumatic action, and is inclosed in a handsome carved oak screen.

Sixteen hundred Bibles were stacked to form crosses and pyramids on the platform of Bethany Presbyterian Church Sunday afternoon in connection with a special service conducted by the Philadelphia Gideons. At the close of the service the Gideons carried the Bibles in automobiles to hotels throughout the city. A Bible is placed in every hotel room, where it will catch the eyes of the guest. Members of the Gideons delivered brief addresses at the service.

Prominent visitors in Philadelphia recently included Bisohp Nathaniel S. Thomas, of Wyoming, who preached a missionary sermon Sunday morning in the Church of the Holy Apostles, of which he was at one time the rector. The Rev. Dr. Herbert J. Glover, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Brooklyn, preached in Holy Trinity Church Sunday morning, under the auspices of the rexel-Biddle Bible classes. The Rev. Dr. Stewart L. Tyson, of Princeton, N. J., preached Sunday evening in the Chapel of the Mediator, West Philadelphia.

The Ven. R. Bowden Shepherd, Archdeacon of the Diocese of New Jersey, spoke at the autumnal meeting of the Church Historical Society November 21, in the Church House. His topic was "The Founding of the Church in New Jersey."

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop preached to a congregation of over three hundred people in the Baptist Church at Tifton Sunday evening, November 20, discussing the burial of the "Unknown Soldier" Armistice Day and the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments. In the morning he held service in St. Anne's Chapel, and the subject of his sermon was "Christian Service."

Recruits for the Ministry: There are now six postulants for Holy Orders in the Diocese, four of these having offered themselves in the last few months. Mr. Claude M. Hobart, from St. Paul's Church, Augusta, and Mr. Harold Johnson, from Christ Church, Savannah, are at the DuBose Memorial School, Monteagle, Tenn.; Mr. Julian F. Scott, from St. Thomas' Church, Thomasville, is a student at the Theological Seminary of the University of the South, and Mr. Basil Cole, from Grace Church, Waycross, who is not attending any seminary as yet. There are two colored postulants, William Essex Forsyth, son of the Rev. A. M. Forsyth, vicar of St. Cyprian's Mission, Darien, who is at a school in Florida, and Herbert Randolph Moore, from St. Stephen's Church, Savannah, who has recently gone to the Bishop Payne Divinity School.

A large congregation witnessed the presentation in Grace Church, Waycross, of the pageant, "Advance the Line," in preparation for the Every-Member Canvass, November 20.

St. Paul's Church, Albany, gave an especially fine organ recital on a recent Sunday afternoon, that was attended by a congregation that completely filled the church building.

On the twenty-second Sunday after Trinity the Bishop instituted the Rev. J. S. Braithwaite, rector of St. Stephen's Church (colored), Savannah. The Bishop preached the sermon on the duties and relations of the rector and the people, and was assisted in the service by the Rev. J. Henry Brown, Archdeacon of the colored work in the Diocese.

SPOKANE

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. E. Leslie Rolls, formerly rector of Christ Church, Puyallup, Wash., has commenced his ministry at Grace Church, Ellensburg, which is one of the five parishes in the District of Spokane, the rest of the churches being missions, three of which are almost self-supporting.

Roslyn and Cle Elum, mining towns, received a visit from Bishop Herman Page and was accorded a reception at a dinner attended by the leading representatives of the vicinity and included men and women of other faiths than our own, thus showing the cordial spirit which exists between the Church and friends of other communions. During his visit the Bishop officiated at both Roslyn and Cle Elum.

A pageant, "The Light of the World," given under the direction of Mrs. J. Elmer West, and under the auspices of the Woman's Auxiliary of All Saints' Cathedral, Spokane, of which Mrs. F. Atkinson is president, was presented at All Saints', St. James' and St. Matthew's, and proved to be a most valuable lesson in the work, aims and objects of the Episcopal Church. The caste was large, efficient and most reverent in presentation.

The work at St. Paul's, Kennewick, and Church of our Saviour, Pasco, is showing a marked improvement in spite of loss by removals of some active workers. Bishop Page visited these churches recently and reports that the Rev. E. R. Allman is accomplishing work which already shows definite results.

The Ven. George H. Severance not only covers a large territory, but undaunted by discouragements, and unspoiled by success, is reaching out into new fields, and already reports are coming in of Church people who are now rejoicing in occasional services which until recently they have not been able to have, for lack of clergy and Church workers.

Collect for Second Sunday in Advent.

Blessed Lord, Who hast caused all holy Scriptures to be written for our learning, grant that we may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn and inwardly digest them, that by patience and comfort and Thy Holy Word, we may embrace, and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life, which Thou hast given us in our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Bride of Christ.

Be patient; bide His time, Who will not tarry;
A thousand years He measures as a day;
All human plans, since human, may miscarry;
His never! Keep His counsel; watch and pray.
"Put up thy sword," He saith,
Be faithful unto death."

Since the first saints embraced His cross, and dying,
No earthly triumph saw, yet were content,
On His dear presence, though unseen, relying,
His holy Church has walked the way He went;
Afflicted, destitute,
And sore from head to foot.

Thou yet shalt see her, all her trials ended,
Robed as in garments woven white of flame,
When He by thousand, thousand saints attended,
Their lifted foreheads burning with His name,
Shall come to claim the rest
Who wait His advent blest.

Faith.

Kate Davis.

It was evening of a late summer day. Old Mrs. Radford walked, or rather hobbled, along the edge of her garden. Her wrinkled old face wore a pitiful expression as she tugged at a weed here and there in her effort to thin out the heaviest growth that had almost covered her garden plants. A thin, sallow, worn-out woman stood to one side with a small child clinging at her skirts. Her eyes followed the older woman almost crossly.

"I wish to goodness, ma, you'd listen to reason," the younger woman said. "You can't stay here with nothing to live on. The town won't let you; they'll take you to the poor-house."

A blow would have been kinder than those last words to the old woman. For a moment her face became terror-stricken.

"I guess this town won't trouble itself much about me, Martha," she replied. "This is my home; I got a right to stay here. God will provide for me; He always has."

Mrs. Hickson looked at her mother with almost contempt.

"You make me tired sometimes, ma, with your 'God will provide.' I guess maybe He'll provide something if you come and live with us. Otherwise He won't, I can tell you."

The old lady shook her head sadly.

"Not in Sam Hickson's house," she said; "you know that could never be."

The daughter turned away despairingly and the mother continued her survey of the weed-grown garden until darkness drove her into the house. Then over a cup of tea and crackers she turned her problem over and over, and fought back that haunting spectre of the poor-house which had troubled her so much lately.

"God will take care of me," she said again to herself. "He always has provided a way for me."

Old Mrs. Radford was just a part of one of the many tattered and ragged edges of humanity. She had been a very strong woman and had earned her living by hard, physical toil. Her husband, long since dead, had never been very energetic about his work, so she had always been accustomed to stand alone in the world. She had had nine children, all of whom had died but two daughters. Of those, one had romantically run off and married the worthless Sam Hickson, whom her mother could not respect, and whom she herself almost hated now. The other girl had married a young farmer, who had moved to the far West. There, with a fast-increasing family of her own, her connection with the old home became less and less as years went by.

Now in the deserted nest that had been her home almost ever since her marriage, old Mrs. Radford faced the biggest problem that had ever conconfronted her. How could she pass the rest of her existence now that she no longer was able to work?

There was a touch of autumn in the air three weeks later, and some of the trees had already been nipped by a light frost, and were turning red. Mrs. Radford sat on the steps of her front porch shaking her white head stubbornly at her daughter, who was leaving.

There's no use in you asking me to come and live with you, Martha," she said. "Sam isn't even good to you; you know he wouldn't be good to me. Don't worry about me; God will provide if you just have faith in Him."

Martha turned away with a heavy heart. Too well she knew that her mother's words about her husband were true; but how was her mother going to live with no fuel and scarcely any food? A few weeks earlier Martha had written an appeal to her sister, but she was having her own troubles. The crop had been a failure that summer, a new baby had come, and they didn't know how they were going to manage through the winter.

In despair Martha pled with her mother to share her home, such as it was; but old Mrs. Radford was too proud to live in the house of the son-in-law she scorned.

After her daughter had gone the old lady mechanically went about her tasks, which from long habit she felt still existed. She dusted the top of the stove, moved some of the chairs as if arranging them in order. One watching her would have seen her lips move; but no sound came.

Two weeks more passed away; it was now getting quite cold. A few neighbors who had been watching old Mrs. Radford closely for some time went to Mr. Hodge, the county supervisor, with the complaint that they could no longer stand to have the old lady want, and that something must be done about it. Mr. Hodge had gone first to Martha, then to her mother. He had advised, persuaded and threatened.

"If you will not live with your daughter, Mrs. Radford, you should go into some home."

Here Mr. Hodge coughed slightly, and the old lady seemed to shrink visibly.

"We cannot stand to see you suffer for want before our very eyes," he continued.

The old lady turned away, with abject misery in her face.

"Why don't the neighbors let me alone?" she said. "God will take care of me."

Mr. Hodge tried to look indulgent.

"Think it over tonight, Mrs. Radford," he said as he turned away, "and I'll see you in the morning."

He did not need to tell her to think it over; she had been doing that almost continuously for the past three months.

After he had gone she moved about as if in a trance, going about her imaginery tasks. At last she prepared to go to bed. Slowly and laboriously she undressed; her muscles stiffened by rheumatism, ached in the cold of the room. With an expression of persistent stubborn faith on her face, she painfully and awkwardly got down on her knees by the side of the bed. She covered her face with her thin hands for a moment, and then with face upturned and eyes closed she prayed:

"Oh God, You will provide, won't You? You always have provided a way; You will now, even if I can't work. I don't want to go to the poor-house, and I can't live with Martha. Please take care of me."

Her prayer ended, she painfully struggled to her feet and got into bed.

The next morning Mr. Hodge frowned as he tied his horse in front of Mrs. Radford's house. That troublesome old woman threatened to make an unpleasant morning for him. Just what steps he must take to get her to go either to her daughter's house or to the county house, four miles away, he did not know.

"She must go to one or the other," he said to himself. "We can't see her stay here and suffer any longer."

With an air of condescending indulgency he knocked at the door. No answer coming, he knocked again.

"Must be in bed; couldn't have gone out so early," he muttered.

Getting no answer to his second knock, he opened the door a little and put his head inside.

"Mrs. Radford," he called, but there was not a sound except his own voice.

He stepped inside, and walked across to the bedroom door that stood open. Here he uttered a short exclamation of surprise, for on the bed, her eyes closed as if in peaceful sleep, lay the untenanted body of old Mrs. Radford. God had provided a way.

True Love.

O, to come home once more, when the dusk is falling,
To see the nursery lighted and the children's table spread;
"Mother, mother, mother!" the eager voices calling.
"The baby was so sleepy that he had to go to bed!"

O, to come home once more and see the smiling faces,
Dark heads, bright heads, clustered at the pane;
Much the years have taken, when the heart its path retraces,
But until time is not for me that image will remain.

Men and women now they are, standing straight and steady,
Grave heart, gay heart, fit for life's emprise;
Shoulder set to shoulder, how should they be but ready!
The future shines before them with the light of their own eyes.

Still each answers to my call; no good has been denied me,
My burdens have been fitted to the little strength that's mine.
Beauty, pride and peace have walked by day beside me,
The evening closes gently in, and how can I repine?

But, O, to see once more, when the early dusk is falling,
The nursery windows glowing and the children's table spread;
"Mother, mother, mother!" the high child voices calling,
"He couldn't stay awake for you; he had to go to bed!"

Nora's Hash.

Nora had applied for the position of cook. She was big and honest and wholesome looking, and when we heard her tell how she had lost her husband and children in an epidemic we were ready to engage her at once. Still we asked a question or two.

"Are you a good cook, Nora?"

"I'm not sich an iligant cook whin it comes to the fancy dishes, but for plain, ivery-day cooking I can git along." Then her Irish blue eyes twinkled. "Whin I was first married me mon says to me, 'Nora, me girl, it's a happy change I'm a-goin' to have from the old boardin' house, and it's home cooking I'm after needin'. Only one thing, Nora; promise me on yer life ye won't feed me hash. I'm tired of hash, and I'm not carin' to see iny the rest of me born days.'"

Nora pronounced "hash" with the richest Irish brogue.

"'Yer right, Jimmy, me love,' says I. 'On me word ye'll niver see hash in our home!'

"Well, the very first day we had a piece of a fine bit of shteak lift, bein' only the two of us, and I shtudied and I shtudied. Thin I made a nice stew of the scraps with a bit of onion and potato and gravy. Jimmy looked at it with both his sharp eyes, and thin he looked at me. 'Nora,' says he, 'ye promised me ye wouldn't be makin' hash.' 'Sure, and it's me word that's not broken,' says I, laughin'; 'that's not hash; that's Irish stew. Taste it fer yerself.' Well, Jimmy helped himself till it was all gone. 'That's the bist meal I've been atin' for a month of Sundays,' says he. 'Nora, ye may be makin' Irish stew iny time!'

"After a spell I found some more scraps—and me not wastin' a crumb. So I fixed up the viry nicest dish I knew. 'Nora,' says me mon, 'Nora, what's in that dish? It's suspicious, it is. Isn't that baked hash?'

"'Ah, Jimmy, me lad, be afther tastin' it for yerself,' I says. 'Didn't I promise' ye I wouldn't make hash? That's not hash; it's toad-in-the-hole!'

"Well, there wasn't a mite of trouble about Jimmy's atin' at all, me havin' a bite, too, of course. Thin Jimmy wetted his lips, and he says, says he, 'Nora, toad-in-the-hole's good atin' iny day in the wake! But don't make hash!'

"He was a fine lad, was Jimmy, and who would have thought in tin years he'd be gone, and the dear childer and I left alone, alone."

The merry twinkle vanished in a soft mist in Nora's bright eyes, and we were all silent for a few minutes. Then with a brave sigh she shook off the gloom, and the generous mouth broadened into a laugh, even before the moisture was gone from the twinkling eyes.

"No," she said, "I niver broke me promise to Jimmy. I niver gave him hash to his dyin' day. The nixt time I put me scraps on the table he had that same suspicious look. 'Now, Nora, this be hash for sure!'

"'And why would I be tillin' ye a lie, Jimmy? Jest sample it fer yerself, Jimmy,' says I. 'That's the dish the French men cooks make in all the fine, shwell hotels, me mon! That's French rag-out!'"

Though we doubted whether a French chef would have recognized the name as Nora pronounced it, we were firmly convinced that she knew the art of making excellent rag-out. She had stopped to laugh, but she was speaking again.

"Whin Jimmy looked into that impty dish, 'Nora,' says he, 'what for do people make hash whin there are so mony iligant concoctions instid, and French rag-out the top of the heap?'

"Well, he niver pried into me cookin' ag'in, and I niver wasted a scrap of mate; but I niver broke me word. Jimmy niver had to ate hash!"—Youth's Companion.

"Feed My Sheep."

Jesse Jonette.

When I look out upon the world
And see the piteous need,
My soul cries out to Thee, O Lord,
The multitudes to feed.

And then I hear the Spirit say:
If thou beholdest the need,
O gird thee on the Word of God
And with the dying plead—

Go tell them of the Saviour's love,
For them as well as thee;
Go show them where, the Bread of Life,
And feed the world for Me.

Seven Miles Above the Earth.

Seven and a half miles up!

The region of terrific winds, yet not enough oxygen to keep a man alive! The realm of freezing cold, where the mercury slides down to 60 below! An altitude so great that the skin on the body begins to swell, simply from lack of air pressure!

To that tremendous height, a bit higher, even, soared Lieutenant John A. Macready, of the United States Air Service, McCook Field, Dayton, O., when he won the high flying championship of the world. Breaking all previous records, he winged a long, lone air trail to a level of 40,800 feet, more than ten thousand feet higher than the grim crest of Mount Everest, the "top of the world," and actually 7.7 miles above the earth.

Human nerves and human brains both triumphed in this instance. Two inventions of science, the General Electric Moss supercharger and the Caldwell high-pitch propeller, accomplished the unheard-of.

Macready's record flight is believed to assure high altitude, high speed air transportation as a practicable matter. Air craft at that height can make 200 miles an hour, due to small air resistance and absence of storms. That is equivalent to 300 miles an hour on the ground.

Therefore, the possibility is foreseen by aviators of flying from New York to Chicago in three hours, and from New York to San Francisco in nine hours!—Bristol Herald-Courier.

Smiles From the Japanese.

Of all people, the Japanese are the most eager to learn. Industrious and earnest in everything, they are especially so in learning to speak English. But they have difficulty in pronouncing their l's and y's, and some of the mistakes they make are amusing. While you are walking along the street in Tokyo, writes a correspondent, it is not unusual for a man to approach you and, with his peculiar accent, say:

"Goodo morning, sah; aru you quito werry tsuday? Preasu reto me comu and visito you sometimes. I wouldo liku tsu becomu youru furendo."

That is quite a language in itself; but the Japanese do not make all the mistakes. Their own language has its subtleties, and when Americans who attempt to speak it confuse their vowels or misplace their accent, the smiles are all on the other side. For example, a missionary who was performing a wedding ceremony said, "Miss Matsushima, you are to tottsugu Mr. Hashimoto"; but the verb to marry is totsugu. Tottsugu means to be caught by an evil spirit! The onlookers must indeed have smiled at that; and it is to be hoped that the butcher whose shop an American lady once visited was not inclined to be too matter-of-fact when she asked him for "two pounds of neko." The word for meat is niku. Neko is the word for cat!

There is a story of an English professor who wanted to learn how to say good morning in Japanese. So early one day he stood in the hall of the Japanese dormitory and waited. In a few moments two students approached from opposite ends. Of course, thought the professor, they would say good morning to each other; but since the hall happened to be unusually dirty at that hour, their morning salutation was, "Oh, isn't this hall dirty!" The professor, highly elated, passed on to the dining-room, and, entering with a satisfied smile, bowed and startled every one by saying, "Oh, isn't this hall dirty!"

But one day, while traveling down a lonely street, a jinrikisha man was more than startled when the foreigner he was carrying exclaimed, "Koroshite-kure, koroshite-kure!" which means, "Kill me, kill me!" That was hardly what the traveler wanted; he wished merely to be allowed to descend. The word for that is oroshite-kure.

To say that we are temples of God is not to use a figure of speech. It is the temple of stone that is the figure; the true dwelling-place of God is man. In nothing can God reveal Himself as He can in man. Through nothing else can He express so much of what is truly divine.—Marcus Dods.

For the Young Folks

Autumn Song.

Crispy leaves in the crispy air,
  Falling, falling, falling!
Raggedy trees, all thin and bare,
And a smoky haze in the valley where
  The crows are calling, calling!

On sunlit, shimmery wings of down,
  The milkweed seeds are blowing;
The bitter-sweet berries are golden brown,
  And the pumpkins all are glowing.

The crackly leaves are about my feet,
  Whirling, whirling, whirling!
The rascally wind is keen and fleet.
And, oh, the smell of the autumn's sweet,
  When the smoke is curling, curling!

Tang of ripening grapes in the sun,
  And the windfall apples mellow!
And every day is a golden one,
  For Fall is a golden fellow!
    —Eleanore Jewett, in St. Nicholas.

The Genial Giant.

In the daytime, when Miss Chatty's store was open and customers might drop in at any moment, she was very stern and quite liable to snap her thin fingers at you if you asked too many questions or dropped things on the floor. But evenings, after she had locked the front door, counted the money in the black tin box, and put everything in good order, then she was a different person. She would push her glasses up on top of her head, take her green watering can, and go out into the garden behind the store to water the plants. The big yellow cat would jump down out of the window and slowly follow her. And about that time in the evenings, if Muddy-Heels teased hard enough, she nearly always told him a story. She had a great many of them in her head, and he, like all the other children in the street, never, never got enough stories.

One evening we were all up at that end of the street, playing jack-straws. We saw her lock the door, and some one said:

"Let's get her to tell us a story."

So we all scampered into the garden, and when she came out with her green watering can we all began, "Miss Chatty, please, please tell us a story!"

Of course she said that she didn't know any. Grown-ups always say that. But we kept on squealing, "Please, please."

Suddenly Miss Chatty clapped her thin hands and asked us if we could see a funny old fellow over there in the clouds. Some could see him, and some couldn't. So she pointed very carefully, and then it was easy enough. In the red evening sky was a great, big head which looked like a jolly old man laughing. You could almost hear him chuckling. He had a long nose, a sharp chin, and a pointed cap.

"Tell us a story about him, please, Miss Chatty," we said.

So she did, and here is the story in the exact words:

"Once, in a place called Somewhere Else, which is beyond the horizon, there lived the Genial Giant. When people called him a giant he was very uncomfortable, because, as he said himself, giants were usually cruel and terrible, while he was as gentle as a lamb and lived only to laugh and do good. But he was very big even for a giant, and could rush clear around the horizon and back again in about a minute. He saw everything that happened; knew where everybody lived and how they behaved.

"He always knew the windows where there were sick children, and he loved to make funny pictures with clouds to amuse them. And sometimes he'd borrow the New Moon or the Morning Star and hang them in the sky where the children could see.

"When the North Wind got too frisky, blowing his icy breath on people, then the Genial Giant would chase him, and pull his beard and make him stop his impudence. But what he liked best was to pile up a huge pile of clouds at sunset, then paint them red, or gold or purple. When it was done and people were standing about gaping at the beautiful sight, then that funny old giant would knock the whole thing over just as you would a card house. This was one of his best jokes, and he'd laugh and laugh over it.

"Some days, when the sky is just plain blue—blue—blue—then you may know that the Genial Giant has pulled all the big white clouds down below the horizon and is taking a nap on them, just as you would on a feather bed. He puts the sun to bed every night, fixes him up in a bed of nice, soft clouds, then calls him when it is time to get up in the morning."

But while Miss Chatty had been talking, the Genial Giant had grown smaller and smaller, his cap had dropped off, and his nose touched his chin. Then he suddenly slipped out of sight, and we knew that he had gone to put the Sun to bed.

Just then Big Dick came whistling up the street, lighting the lamps as he came. Mothers began calling children home, and Miss Chatty said it was getting damp, so every one said good night and went home.—G. A. Kay, in Good Housekeeping.

Vincent's Neighbor.

The man on the platform talked a good deal about being a good neighbor. Vincent could not understand all he said, because he talked so fast and the words he used were not the words of a boy. But he did understand enough to want very much to be a good neighbor.

In the summer hotel with Vincent and his father and mother were other grown people. He did not see how he could be a neighbor to them.

Of course he could run errands for his mother, and, of course, he would mind quickly when she spoke to him. But that was not being neighborly, not when she was his own mother. A neighbor was some one outside the family, Vincent was sure.

While he was thinking about it he went down the beach to play with his new sail-boat. The sail-boat was a very wonderful gift from his Uncle Vincent, which he found waiting for him when he reached the Assembly Park with his father and mother.

It was named "The Clipper," and was painted yellow and black, with snowy white sails. Vincent could wade out in the shallow water for a long way, and by fastening a cord to the boat, so it could not get away, it would sail almost as well as the big boats on the lake.

Vincent had sailed his boat up and down the beach for a while and had forgotten all about being neighborly, when he chanced to look toward the shore. A little Chinese boy, the son of the laundryman, sat there watching him.

Now, Vincent did not know just how Chinese boys felt about sail-boats. If it had been an American boy, he would have known at once that he ought to ask him to come on out and have some fun. But this little boy looked so different that Vincent thought he might feel different. So he played by himself, while the brown eyes of the little dark-skinned boy followed him.

"Don't you want to sail her?" Vincent asked at last. "You have to hang on tight, so she won't get away."

The dark eyes danced, and the little fellow jumped up and took the cord from Vincent. He splashed out into the water, and "The Clipper" spread her white sails proudly, as she floated off. The Chinese boy shouted and laughed, just as Vincent had the first time he sailed her.

"Here! I got some more string," he said to Vincent. "Let's tie that on. Then we can both sail her."

The two boys played very happily together, until Vincent's mother came down to tell him it was almost time for dinner. Then he remembered the question he had been wondering about in the afternoon—how to be a good neighbor. He wondered whether letting the little Chinese boy play with his sail-boat would be counted neighborly. He hadn't really done anything; he only helped him to have a good time. He decided to ask his mother.

What do you think she said about it?—The Mayflower.

An Adventure in the Alps.

Ten years ago, amid the beautiful Alps in Switzerland, an incident befell me. It was the kind that is never forgotten, and I remember it as distinctly as if it had happened only yesterday.

Early in the morning my sister, Betty, myself and two of my best friends, Julia Benjamin and Dotsie Imbrie, woke up from a pleasant sleep in a snug hotel in a little town at the foot of the Alps. Putting on our warmest clothes, we went down-stairs for breakfast, and the next hour found us outside and preparing for a walk up the mountains. It was not long before we were climbing up to beautiful snow-capped peaks and vaulting steep canyons or admiring beautiful landscapes.

We traveled on and on, covering many miles, but about 12 o'clock the weather became a little cloudy. This did not hinder us in the least at that time, but as the day waned it began to snow. Then came the unfortunate part. As we were vaulting an unusually large canyon, our sticks broke and down we went. None of us said a word as we fell, and I did not feel the ground as I touched it, for I am sure that we all were knocked unconscious.

Some time later I felt something very queer, and opening my eyes, saw something shaggy beside me. I was sure it was a bear, and I shuddered. The thing turned around and looked at me. To my great joy and surprise, I saw in front of me a Saint Bernard dog. Sitting up, I also saw about half a dozen other dogs trying to awaken Betty, Dotsie and Julia. They soon succeeded. On each dog's collar was written, "Follow me." Accordingly, we obeyed the message, and the dogs led us to a large building nearby. We followed the dogs into a warm room in which were two men dressed like monks. They took us to a large room containing many beds. There we undressed and went to bed for two hours. Then we had a meal, and after it the monks asked us where we came from and told us where we were.

The next day we were told the way home, but we did not go until we had seen where the monks kept their dogs. Fortunately, there were some puppies, and the monks presented to each of us a Saint Bernard puppy in memory of the monks and their faithful dogs of the Saint Bernard Monastery.

Moss Roses.

This is the story of the first moss rose.

One day the little daughter of the Wise Chief fell very ill. No one knew how to make her well again, for that was hundreds of moons ago, before wise men had found so many ways to heal the sick.

All the people were sad, for they loved the beautiful little girl.

After they had held a council, the grandmother of the Wise Chief said, "I will go far away into the fields and woods and search until I find healing herbs that will make the child well again."

So, just as the Moon Mother put the stars to sleep under the fleecy clouds, the old woman set forth on her journey.

She went first into the big, cool, friendly woods. There all day long she searched, first beside a singing brook, where the little fishes played in the sunshine and shadow, then at the foot of the tall forest trees, among the bright red berries and dark glossy leaves. But she did not find the healing herbs.

After that she went into the fields. On the slope of a hill in the distance stood three little pine trees, side by side. They looked as if they were marching up the hill; their long top branches, like fingers, touched the sky.

"I, too, will climb the hill," the old woman said to herself.

While she searched the slope of the hill the moon came up, big and round and beautiful, behind the tall pine trees. One long silver beam pierced the dark pine boughs and seemed to point to a bush a few yards away.

The old woman went over to the bush and found it covered with clusters of little roses, smooth and pink. She parted the branches and peered in. Lo, the ground was covered with soft green velvet moss, and, rooted in the moss, safe and flourishing, were the healing herbs!

The grandmother was very happy. She said to the rose-bush, "Because you have guarded so well the healing herbs for the little sick daughter of the Wise Chief, I will make you more beautiful than any other rose."

Then she wrapped each smooth pink rosebud in a little piece of the moss and went away.

She carried the healing herbs to the Wise Chief's lodge and steeped them in water in the sun and gave them to the daughter of the chief. Then the child got well.

Soon afterwards the same little girl went hunting for wild flowers on a certain hill. And in the slope of that hill she found, blooming shy and lovely in the shadow of three slim pines, the very first moss roses in the world.

Miss Peppermint Jones.

There's a lady lives in a sweet-shop;
Her name is Miss Peppermint Jones;
She smiles at us when we go to buy,
And whispers in sugary tones.

Oh, what a fortunate lady,
To live in a shop full of sweets:
We know that after the door is shut
She eats and eats and eats!

"How much are these?" we ask her,
And she answers, "Twelve for a dime,
Six for a nickel, or one for a cent."
Whispering, all the time.

Whispering, whispering, whispering,
Always in sugary tones.
It's living all day with sugar plums
Does that to Miss Peppermint Jones.

Each cheek is as pink as a gumdrop,
And chocolate brown is her hair;
And her face is round like a cooky cake
As she stands by the counter there

We think what a fortunate lady
To live in a shop like that,
With tarts for breakfast, taffy for tea,
And licorice mice for her cat!

God the Life and Light of the World.

Thou art, O God! the life and light
Of all this wondrous world we see;
Its glow by day, its smile by night,
Are but reflections caught from Thee;
Where'er we turn, Thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are Thine.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF ST. ANDREW IN THE UNITED STATES

An organization in the Church for the spread of Christ's Kingdom among men and boys by means of Personal Prayer and Personal Service.

Convinced that Chapters of the Brotherhood can only attain their maximum effectiveness by having a carefully laid out program covering at least a one-year period, the Brotherhood is suggesting the following minimum program as the basis of the Chapter's corporate work for 1922.

A Monthly Men's Corporate Communion.
Ushering and Hospitality at Church Door.
A Church Attendance Campaign during the year.
House-to-House Canvass to uncover additional opportunities for personal work.
Hotel-Boarding House Work.
Round Table Conferences or Periodic Bible Class.
Organize Junior Chapter if there be none in the Parish.
Arrange two visits to other Chapters or Churches to increase interest in the Brotherhood.
A Delegate to the National Convention.
Co-operate with the Nation-Wide Campaign.

Two or more men or boys, with the consent of the Rector, can organize a Chapter.

Gonzales Deanery.

A meeting of the Gonzales Deanery was held at Cuero on November 2 and 3, the Bishop and seven other clergy being in attendance. On the first day, after an organ recital on the recently purchased pipe organ, an address was given by the Rev. G. R. Fenner, the chaplain of the Military School at San Antonio, setting forth the desire to advance the work of the school on a higher plane as a Church institution.

On the second day reports were made from parishes on the Nation-Wide Campaign. In spite of failure in crops in many places, it was found that pledges had been paid to a large extent, although not all that might be desired. There was a conference on recruiting for the ministry, the Bishop and others being speakers.

The deanery meeting closed with a grand missionary service in the spirit of the Missionary Centennial.

"The Book of Remembrance," dedicated by Bishop Lawrence on October 16, is said to be a very beautiful piece of work designed and constructed by Mr. F. C. D. Palmer, of the Rose Bindery. Mr. Palmer is a Churchman and a lay reader. He has made the book as nearly perfect as possible. It is bound in red morocco, with gold tooling.

Meeting in the interest of Christian unity were held in October at St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston. Brilliant speakers took part in these conferences, notable among them being Dean Rousmaniere, Dr. Calkins, Mr. Robert Gardiner and Mrs. Henry Peabody. "The Possibilities Ahead of a United Church" were set forth by Bishop Lawrence, Bishop Brent, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton and Dr. Arthur Brown.

Bishop Lawrence offered his resignation in July from the Presiding Bishop and Council. It was resolved to decline to accept the resignation, in the hope that returning health would permit his presence at the next quarterly meeting of the Council.

The six hundredth anniversary of St. Francis of Assisi was commemorated by the Church of the Ascension, Fall River, Rev. C. E. Jackson, rector. The following week, at Morning Prayer, an installation service was held for church officers and teachers.

A Conference of Church Boarding School Masters was held recently at Groton to discuss revision of curricula, uniform entrance examinations and other matters relating to the education of church boys.

A new custom is coming into practice at St. Mark's, Fall River, and elsewhere in the Diocese, of having the vestry welcome and usher the confirmation candidate to the altar. In addition to this ,the use of another good feature is becoming established, namely, the assembling of god-parents at this service, and their coming forward to stand by the young people whom they have sponsored.

Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D., Bishop.

Change in Name and Administration of Church Hospital.

Dropping the title Hospital of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Southern Ohio for that of the Children's Hospital, and abolishing the two separate governing bodies, the Board of Trustees, with twenty-seven members, nine to be clergymen, and the Board of Managers, composed of twenty-four women, marked the annual meeting and donation day of that thirty-eight-year-old Cincinnati charity.

A Board of Trustees of six men and six women was elected, illiminating all clerical members except the Bishop and the Bishop Coadjutor, who are members ex-officio, and with the addition of the President of the Co-operative Society.

Three beds were dedicated in memory of Helen Seeley Wilshire, William Alexander Sayers and Edward O. Fitch respectively.

The expense of maintaining the hospital for one year was $67,676. Several private rooms have been added for pay patients, but the larger part of the work is done absolutely free.

Actor Helps City Mission Work.

Burton Mandeville, an actor, who through an acquaintance with Deaconess Drant became interested in the work of the Cincinnati City Mission, spent a week in that city recently and added to his benefactions a visit to the City and County Infirmaries, the Homes of the Incurables, for the Friendless and the Blind, and the city's Tuberculosis Sanatorium. He gave a brief program of readings in each. A very pleasant and fruitful combination of Church and stage.

"'Tis sweet, as year by year we lose
Friends out of sight, in faith to muse
How grows in Paradise our store."

Entered into the rest that remaineth for the people of God, on the 23d of November, 1921, at Pocomoke, Md., KATIE MUIR, daughter of the late Major John W. and Fannie MacArthur Green, wife of Rev. Louis Llewellyn Williams. Born October 3, 1856. Interment at Alexandria, Va

"And with the morn those angel faces smile,
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile."

held at the Cathedral in Cincinnati, with five hundred members representing nine branches present. There were nine of the clergy in the chancel and a vested choir of members. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Henry Jerome Simpson, of the staff of Christ Church, on "Life With God," and after pointing out many social and religious problems of the present day, gave as a solution a life close to the heavenly Father in Christ and not in the effort to "go it alone." The beautiful G. F. S. hymn, by Mrs. A. L. Sessions, "O Thou, Who Blessest Friendship," was sung kneeling, and made a deep impression. A large offering for the missionary work of the G. F. S. was taken.

A Chilly Bath.

Dorothy E. Rice, Age 14 Years.

It was a cool spring evening and five restless children were hunting for something to do.

"Les' go for a row," cried Bill.

The others were delighted, and with Bill in the lead they started off for the pond.

"Oh, wait a minute," he stopped short; "I want a piece of rope." He ran back and got the rope and they were soon on the way again.

When they reached the pond Bill tied the rope to the bow of the boat and the other end he tied to a tree on the dam, and all climbed in.

"Now," said Bill, "my plan is to pull ourselves ashore with this rope. We'll each take a turn."

Gladys, Blair and "Dot" were sitting on the front seat, and Bill and Jim were sitting on the back seat.

Gladys took the first turn in pulling the boat ashore, then Blair, then "Dot," and next came Bill. When he had taken his turn he said, "Now, 'Jim,' 'tis your turn."

Bill started back to his seat and "Jim" started to the front of the boat. They stepped on the same side of the boat.

"Great guns!" cried Jim, "the boat's sinking." The children quickly climbed up on the seats; brave Bill jumped out and waded ashore, and Blair and "Dot" quickly followed his example. But Gladys and Jim stuck to the boat. Blair and "Dot" pulled the boat ashore and Jim and Gladys climbed out.

"Les' try to swim," said adventurous "Dot."

"Mercy," exclaimed Bill, "I'm too wet."

They all laugehd heartily.

Then they ran a race to see which could get to the house first.

Faith and Love grow green and blossom in an atmosphere of gratitude and praise.

The Body of Christ.

The Church is the Body of Christ. That is a figure of speech, but it expresses in the best language we can command a real fact.

When Christ was on earth He used as his vehicle of expression and His instrument for action a material body. Our Lord talked to people using the organs of speech. He went here and there, using His legs. He touched men with His hands. He looked out of His eyes. Now, our Lord teaches, ministers to men, expresses Himself, through His disciples, the people who really believe in Him, obey Him, have fellowship with Him.

Our Lord Jesus, by the Spirit, is in touch with the feeling, the thinking, the energy of men who let Him reach them and mould them.

If our Lord Jesus Christ is to save the world He can only do it through willing, consecrated men and women. He lives in them and through them makes His love and purpose to establish the kingdom of God felt as a power and influence in the world.

God is known in Jesus. God works through Jesus.

God in His essence is beyond our knowledge. We can only know God through creation, through humanity, through good men, pre-eminently through Jesus Christ in whom the fulness of God dwells.

Jesus, let us repeat it for emphasis, is the Mediator between God and man. Through Jesus, God made the world, sustains the world, is imminent in all things. God reaches men, does His work in men, whether they know it or not, through Jesus the Christ.

And therefore all good and holy men in every age and in every religion have often without knowledge of the fact been (unconsciously) Christian.

Justin Martyr (A. D. 150) tells us that the Word, that was perfectly and completely incarnate in Jesus, was partially incarnate in the Greek teachers, like Socrates.

Jesus is today in the same relation to men as He has ever been, particularly and pre-eminently in true Christians. The Church, ideally made up of downright, consecrated disciples, Christ's men, is His Body because Jesus stands in such a relation of personal influence to them, that He can use them, just as He used the earthly body in which and through which He worked while on earth.

Is the Church weak and inefficient? Do we conclude, therefore, that God has become indifferent to the needs of the world? God still loves the world. He still sorrows and suffers with sorrowing, distracted men. He is still the Everlasting Father. Surely Jesus is the same yesterday, today and forever.

But the tragedy of life is this: We blind, ignorant, self-satisfied, selfish Christians will not let Jesus, the Christ, come into our lives, mold us, shape our thinking, do His works of ministry through us.

Do we read the words of Jesus, fix them in our minds, think about them till they become life to us in our thinking, inspiration and guide in our actions?

And how about prayer? Do we pray?

Prayer is something more than petition. It is petition. The apostle says, "Let your requests be made known unto God."

But prayer beginning with petition ends in fellowship and communion.

Prayer is the establishing of a relation between persons, between ourselves and God. The easiest way is to do it consciously through Jesus the Christ. It is that anyway, but we Christians know the mystery hidden for ages, namely, the relationship between God and man is through the Word.

If we enter into relation with God by communion, by prayer, God a person will influence us as a person influences a person, in our thinking, and our moral judgments, and our emotions, in our purposes and in our energy. The Lord Jesus will repeat His life, His experience, in us.

So, do we pray? A Christian may be a member of the church by baptism, but he is only a living member of the living body as he learns to pray Mere going to the Holy Sacrament and receiving the consecrated species does not put life into a man and make him a living member of the vine, or, if you like the figure better, the body. Back of the receiving must be the life of communion in thought, the life of prayer.

The Church lives from age to age something more than an organization, is the Body of Christ, because of the consecrated, faithful men and women who open up their being to God through fellowship with Christ and in whom Christ lives again and finds instruments to use in His work of saving the world.

The weakness, the failure of the Church, is due to us poor, miserable sinners who have the form of Church membership, but do not pray. Because we do not pray, we know not the power of God unto salvation, nor can we be used by Jesus as members of His Body to do His work.—Bishop Morrison.

"Seek Ye First the Kingdom of God."

A worried Church is a weak Church; a worried congregation is for God's purposes a weak congregation. The Church as a whole, and its several congregations, is at this moment financially worried; it is in danger of losing its spiritual tone, its trustfulness, its other-worldliness, because it is anxious and "troubled about many things." It needs time and incentive to reflection and spiritual rest. It needs corporately to sit down and think; to meditate and hear God's voice; to realize in communion the closeness of its touch with God.—Bishop King, Secretary of the S. P. G.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The person most in your power is the person who cares most for you.

An unsanctified minister is an unsent minister.—Spurgeon.

As surely as the meadow grows green when the water flows through it, so surely does faith grow when watered by the Word.

It is a comely fashion to be glad.
Joy is the grace we say to God.
—Jean Ingelow.

If life is to be peaceful, powerful, triumphant, it must be dominated by the assurance that Christ has gone to prepare a place for us in His Father's house of many mansions.—Bishop Cannon.

"Now, lad, make religion the everyday business of your life, and not a thing of fits and starts."—An old Scotchman's advice to David Livingstone.

The safest leaders today have come from homes that gave them religious training in their childhood.

The healthful state of a Christian church, and the progress of Christianity through the world, depend, under God, on the character of the ministry.

"The glory of love is brightest when the glory of self is dim,
And they have the most compelled me who most have pointed to Him.
They have held me, stirred me, swayed me—I have hung on their every word
Till I fain would arise and follow, not them, not them—but their Lord!"

Christ's prayer is the expression of the eternal will respecting those for whom He prays. There is no thought of the Son for man that is not the thought of the Father. There is no dissonance of feeling, no discordance of desire, no conflict of will. The promise that Christ will pray is the assurance that the thing He asks for will be given. It is the utterance of that which is in the heart of God.—J. Hastings.

HELPING TO SAVE CHRISTMAS

This is going to be a hard winter for many people. There is a tragic amount of unemployment. Men are haunting the doors of business houses and factories asking for the hundredth time for work they have almost despaired of finding. You can see them on the streets—not the ordinary loafers and ne'er-do-wells, but men of self-respect, keeping up appearances as well as they can, fighting off the bitter day when they may have to apply for charity, but haggard already with the forlorn hopelessness of a search that leads to nothing.

Meanwhile Christmas is coming on. The hearts of little children are alike, however the winds of the world's affairs may blow. The fact that business is depressed and work is slack will not make them feel any the less the Christmas spirit which in these days begins to fill the air. It will not make the windows of the toy shops look any less like a magic land, nor stop the dreams of the wonderful things which maybe will come with the miracle of Christmas morning. But there are going to be men and women this Christmas who will have to see all the brightness fade from little children's faces. They will have no candles to put on Christmas trees nor any gifts to put underneath them—and the stark fear is at their hearts that there may not be even bread.

It is a time for churches to pray and think and plan. In the first place, there must be a genuine effort to help get at the root of the cause of distress. Men need work, and the fundamental kindness to them and to their families is to help them get it. No church or group of churches can cure at once the deep-lying dislocations which have caused the present unemployment—though it is going to be part of the responsibility of the Church of Christ to study, and to try to shape redemptively, the facts of a social order which so often creates conditions of disaster through wars and international jealousies and the selfishness of ungodly competition and other forces so-called economic which are in the last analysis sins of the soul. But meanwhile we do not have to wait for long-range efforts at general betterment before we can render our immediate and personal service. There ought to be a committee in every congregatioon which will do this practical thing and do it now—namely, to ask, and to keep on asking the people of the congregation to notify the committee of every possible situation to be filled or odd job to be done, in order that the committee may bring applicants into touch with these. Of course a wise committee will work in co-operation with the local Associated Charities and every other bureau of help in such wise as not to produce duplication of effort; but the personal appeal of a church committee will often win a response of co-operation from the people of a congregation of their own friends which no outside agency could ever quite inspire.

And then, when we have done the best we can to get work for men and women who need it, let us not forget the children in those homes where, in spite of our best efforts, an unemployment which has not been relieved will cast its shadow of poverty and fear. Probably most Sunday schools except those whose own children are from the very poor have long ago given up the old selfish custom of having Christmas trees and presents for themselves, but use Christmas instead as the time when they bring their gifts in Christ's name for others. Surely all who have not followed that better way before will want to begin this year. In Sunday schools and churches the generosity of children and of men and women ought to be so organized that the widest possible circle of those who are in distress this Christmas shall be made glad by Christian folk who in their giving will find their own best Christmas blessing.

THE INVINCIBLE CHRIST

In the gospel for the second Sunday in Advent we read these mighty words: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away."

So spoke Jesus in Jerusalem; and meanwhile heads were wagged in scorn and thin lips curled with cruel indignation as Pharisees and priests counselled together how they might convict Him of His blasphemy. Presently the cross which they threatened had come true. A lonely figure went on His way along the road of sorrows. A dark form was lifted up between two thieves against the sky. A voice which had spoken in Galilee and Jerusalem died into silence, while the air quivered with the echo of one bitter cry. His enemies had triumphed. He had said that heaven and earth should pass away, and that His words should not pass away. But heaven and earth stood, and His voice was silenced. He was dead.

Ah, but we say today, the mistake they made was in imagining that it was only a man they had to deal with. He was not a man in the sense they thought Him. He was the Son of God. So we carry back all the splendor of our later imagination into our interpretation of what He seemed then. He was the Son of God, we say. And then our mind clothes Him with all the awful evidence of that divinity. We think of Him as exalted to the right hand of power. We see Him as He has been portrayed for us in paintings and in stained-glass windows, robed and kingly, crowned and sceptred, so different from all others that the dullest eyes might see it. We cannot at first quite understand the denseness of His contemporaries. Since He was the Son of God, why did they not perceive it? And the answer is that they did not perceive it for exactly the same reason that we do not perceive it either, and might not have perceived it then if we had been in their place. All the outward signs of divinity which art and imagination have associated with Jesus are only the crude symbols which we have attached to a fact that can never be seen except by eyes that perceive the invisible. The divinity of Jesus was the divinity of His soul, and men could not see that unless there was a divineness in their own souls to give them sight. There was nothing in the accidents of His life to make His tremendous words credible, and on the surface of appearances His enemies were right in repudiating with scornful anger His message that heaven and earth should pass away, but His words should not pass away. We may come to understand that we might not have been wiser than they, for we are not wiser now. We accept certain great pronouncements of Christianity when these have been authenticated by the centuries, when they are clothed with the majesty of tradition, when they speak from the thrones of obvious success. We believe in Jesus as a theological conception, and equally we may not believe Him as a present fact. We can be as dense as the Pharisee in hearing the voice of Jesus speak to us from unexpected places. We can be as unbelieving as they were in the revolutionary challenge of His Spirit when it comes not as a pious memory from old times, but as a disturbing reality for today. If Jesus had come to the century of Caiaphas and Nicodemus clothed in apocalyptic splendor as Moses or Elias, they might have been impressed, but He came only with the aspect of a man of His own time, and with nothing to mark Him different except the spiritual values which it took a mighty faith to dare appraise. If the Spirit of Jesus came amongst us today in the robes of His resurrection, or in the kingly garments which our art clothes Him with, and by which we make Him remote even in the form of honoring Him, we might listen and obey. But the fact is, that His coming now, like His coming then, is not with any dramatic pageantry, but simply with the unseen authority of a spiritual message which only the spiritually alert can understand.

It was a hard saying, this proclamation of Jesus', that His words, who should be crucified, should never pass away. It is hard still for men to accept the truth of Him who often seems crucified afresh today by the unbelief, the sin, the hard materialism of this world. But we would set ourselves to consider how true, nevertheless, is that amazing saying.

For the fact which we are confronted with is this, that though His enemies prevailed against the body of Jesus, though they slew Him on the tree and buried Him in the garden grave, yet His invincible message moved on with gathering triumph, and is moving still. In spite of many conflicting appearances, it grows increasingly clear that the great forces that shape our life pass in review before, and are judged by the authority of Jesus. "The longer I live," said Napoleon, "the more I am convinced of the powerlessness of the sword and the power of the idea." Our civilization has not become Christian, but at least it has come to the point where all the truest and most thoughtful men find themselves compelled to know that nothing can save it except the motives which are shaped by the mind of Jesus. The power of His thought is eternally creative. However lesser opinions differ, the great convictions of love and brotherhood and service which He created do not waver; but grow more sovereign as experience ripens through the years.

For what is His message before which heaven and earth shall pass away? What is His truth that endures when all else shall fail?

1. In the first place, the one thing which is transcendently worth while in any life is its relationship with God. From that all else will flow. Once let a soul begin to know its rightful communion with the love of the Father whom Jesus revealed, and friendship and love and work, and all the service of the common day, are fragrant from the rivers of that grace. Without that all the provinces of life will be sterile, like an unwatered desert. Without it, life is hard and harsh, a thing perhaps which has the glare of its fierce noon-tide of success, but ends with the thirst and fever of the drifting sand that shows no path to the oases.

2. In the second place, the message of Jesus is the message of loyalty to the Kingdom of God as the one motive great enough to exercise the soul which has found the truth and loveliness of God. Religion is no passive sentiment. It is the rebuilding of our world according to the heavenly pattern. It is the making real in every field of life's activity of the principles of brotherhood and service which Jesus taught to be the will of God.

3. And, finally, it is the message of the cross. A deep conception of the death of Jesus makes us know that the cross was no isolated human accident. It was the eternal symbol of the nature of the love of God. Forever that love suffers with the sins of its children. Forever it is crucified when its redemption is set at naught. And there is a mighty sense in which it becomes true that no human life can ever be gloriously content until it has found its cross, and until in some clear way it is deliberately sacrificing some part of itself for an ideal which it loves better than its own self-saving.

There are many who do not know these things. There are some who partly know, yet do not want to know nor to acknowledge them. But these are realities which shall endure when all else vanishes like sand down a dark river. To build life round the love of God whom Jesus knew, to make that life so builded a castle of devotion from which strong purposes of service can go forth wherever there is sin and need, to put upon the banners of the outgoing heart the sign and meaning of the cross—this is to build the imperishable realities that stand, though heaven and earth may pass away.

ORGANIZING THE YOUNG PEOPLE

We are grateful—and we are sure our readers will be—to the Rev. Robert E. Browning for his clear description, printed on another page, of the Young People's Association which he has helped to organize at Epiphany Church, Washington. In no one thing does this Church of ours suffer more in comparison with other communions than in our lack of development of work among young people. Our Sunday schools have until very recently been lamentably inefficient in their organization and instruction; and though we have made great advance in this respect of late, we have still not discovered how to train for leadership in the Church the boys and girls to whom we are teaching lessons. We have not built up a religious fellowship through which the young people shall learn to develop and to share their spiritual convictions. Every successful experiment in this direction has therefore the particular value which attaches always to the work of pioneers; and many congregations may be inspired to try what even one or two have manifestly proven possible.

What then is prayer? Prayer, it seems to me, is bringing ourselves into such union with God, such confidence in God's power, that we shall ask Him to do for us that which is the very best that we ourselves can receive. We open our lives on all sides, heart, mind and soul, to Him because we have made ourselves open to Him; because we have used every instrument which we know; the doctor, the clergyman, the nurse, the intimate friend, and because we have opened every way of ours through these agencies to Him; and because, above all, we have opened our hearts to Him directly. Therefore, He is able to do for us the very best that is possible. But that answer to prayer is not to be cured; the answer to prayer is not to be rid of our diseases, though that may come incidentally; but the answer to prayer is God, and when we have Him, and when we are sure we are bound into His life we do not care, for we have everything; we have more than the world itself; we have God and He is ours forever and forever.—C. S. Slattery.

THE CHURCH AND THE YOUNG PEOPLE

By the Rev. Robert E. Browning

AT Epiphany Church, Washington, there was organized about a year ago a Young People's Society, whose object, as stated in the constitution, is to "promote an earnest Christian life among its members, increase acquaintance among the young people of the parish, to train them for work in the church, and in every way make them more useful in the service of God and their fellowmen."

The present article, written at the request of the Southern Churchman, aims to tell something of the working out of this splendid ideal for the young people of our Church. I am asked to be explicit, and therefore begin by telling how we started. It was largely a venture of faith, for the field has remained almost unexplored. The Episcopal Church has few stars in its crown for its work among young people. We have studiously delegated this work to our brethren of other faiths, who have allowed no grass to grow under their feet.

Calling a few interested young men and women together, we decided that on a certain Sunday evening we would organize. Appeals were sent out to the young men and young women who attended services, urging them to come. At the first session things looked dark. Scarcely a corporal's guard responded. We postponed the organizing of the society till another date, thinking to have more present, and every effort was made through another appeal sent out to the young people. This time our persistence was rewarded. One of those responding to the call was a fine young fellow, the private secretary of a Congressman. We made him president of the organization, and he has shown unflagging zeal and devotion to the cause.

The aims and purposes were stated. The need for some society to bring together on the highest plane those of both sexes was voiced. There was considerable discussion as to whether the society should be chiefly social, or be largely religious. The latter phase prevailed. Then the following Sunday evening at 6 o'clock the frail bark was launched into the deep, with a leader appointed from among the members to lead the discussion on some practical religious subjects. About twenty-five members were present at this meeting. Opening with a hymn and prayers, there followed reading of Scripture, then another hymn, and the leader introduced the subject, calling upon those present to speak. After about forty minutes devoted to the subject, there followed another hymn, offering and announcements, after which all were requested to tarry for a social half-hour, enlivened by simple refreshments, prepared by some of the girl members of the society. This added the necessary touch of hospitality and cordiality. All were invited to remain for the evening service in church. Later on the formal organizing of the society was perfected by a week-night "business" meeting, as it was called, and a constitution and set of rules provided. These business meetings are held once each month to attend to the business affairs of the society. They are followed by a social evening of dancing and games. These meetings are always well attended. It was decided that each member, on entering the society, should sign the following pledge card, a large number of which we had printed for this purpose:

Episcopal Young People's Society.

PLEDGE.

Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for Strength, I Promise Him:

That I will strive to do whatever He would like to have me do;

That I will endeavor to make my own life more consecrated by prayer, Scripture reading, and attendance at church services;

That I will endeavor to help others, by word, deed and personal example;

That as an active member of this society, I will be true to all my duties, by being present at and taking some part in its meetings, unless prevented by some reason which I can conscientiously give to my Lord and Master.

Each week a different leader leads in the discussion. Live, up-to-date subjects are announced, and many are found eager to speak. Naturalness and reality are the order of the meeting. It is inspiring to hear these young people discuss religious problems in their own way. Some of the topics are: "Sunday Amusements," "Christian Unity," "Making the Most of One's Work," "Gambling," "Making Religion Real," "Music and Religion," "Lives That Have Inspired Us," and "Christianity and Disarmament." Occasionally an outside speaker will be invited. Recently Congressman Ward spoke most interestingly on the disarmament question. Being in close proximity to the Virginia Seminary, we have had many of the students come and join in these helpful religious meetings. It was soon seen which way the wind was blowing. The meetings increased in interest and numbers. Soon one hundred and fifty were on the rolls. The large parish hall was getting well filled. It was a real joy also to see these young folks make a practical demonstration of religion in visiting various charitable institutions and homes about the city. As many as thirty have gone off on these missionary "expeditions," to bring cheer and inspiration to orphans and others. They have helped in a number of worthy objects by contributing both individually and out of the common treasury. They are eager to respond to appeals for help. Good workers have been secured for various church organizations. The organization serves as a sort of recruiting ground for parish helpers. Its members are being trained in Christian leadership. Here, it may be, will be found some to fill in the gaps in the shortage in the ministry.

But over and above all this, the much greater result is the awakening in the hearts of these young people of a new conception of religion. It is religion becoming articulate. Conventional religion had failed to awaken them. Now it had become personal and individual, a habit of thought and speech. The society, though scarcely six months old, had made so rapid and healthy a growth among the young people of the church and community that the new rector, Dr. Freeman, felt inspired to pay it the following compliment: "I am most profoundly impressed by what I have seen of the work of the Young People's Society. It is the most remarkable thing I have seen in the Episcopal Church." He spoke from his heart and from a wide experience of the Church's life. So eager are the members in seeing that the interest shall not diminish that it has been decided to keep running throughout the summer, and each Sunday evening, though very warm, the meetings are held and much enthusiasm shown.

All of which leads me to believe, as I conclude, that what we have accomplished here may be done just as well elsewhere. We have not believed in the stored up energy of our young people who often yearn for some outlet in the Church for an abounding enthusiasm and activity. We must make this venture of faith in the idealism of the young. They will not fail us. This idealism will give to the Episcopal Church a fountain of perennial youth and strength. It is the most superb thing in the Church. To me it is the Church's greatest asset for doing good in the world. We must win our young people when it is easy to do so, and save for God and His Church this mighty army which gradually drifts away after confirmation, because, as many openly confess, to our shame, there is "nothing doing" in our Church.

I long to see in our Church, not only Diocesan Young People's Service Leagues, such as that of Texas and Southern California, but a national organization of young people. But this ideal can only come through each individual parish making the venture. If this brief sketch shall stir up the desire in other parishes for a similar work, the writer will feel amply rewarded and will gladly furnish further detailed information, if desired. The summer is an admirable time for working out plans for the autumn campaign.

I am sure they (the dead who have cherished love in this life) are not less alive in the Spirit Life, but much more alive, going on with finer and more fascinating work, with greater scope for development, clearer understanding, and less to bewilder and hamper them. Things must be better in the next stage, and, being freed from the clumsiness of matter, they must have finer powers to work with, and keener enjoyment.—Quoted from letter in Cathedral Leaflet.

It is the ten minutes after prayer that matter. You say your prayers, but before God has time to answer you are up from your knees and off. We do not hear what the answer is: we do not wait to hear what it is. It may be that for years God has been trying to say something to us, but we have never given Him time to speak to us. . . . "Be still and know that I am God."—The Bishop of London.

THE PROBLEM OF CHRISTIAN REUNION

By the Rev Beverley D. Tucker, Jr., D. D..

THE action of the Lambeth Conference of 1920 in issuing an Appeal to All Christian People* on the subject of Christian Reunion has served, at least, to give this problem a new importance and urgency as a subject for consideration and discussion among Episcopalians. There is perhaps no better commentary on the Lambeth Appeal than Dr. Headlam's Bampton Lectures, which preceded the Lambeth Conference by several months. Dr. Headlam not only anticipated the method of approach to reunion and the definite proposals which were recommended by the Bishops of the Anglican Communion in conference assembled, but in one vital consideration he has given a bolder lead than the Conference saw fit to adopt.

There was a popular saying amongst soldiers during the war in respect of army life, which seems pertinent to current proposals for Christian Reunion, namely, "It's a great life if you don't weaken." While we recognize, with gratitude to God, the new spirit of approach to the subject which the Lambeth Appeal has manifested; yet one can but regret that, with reference to its one definite proposal, the action of the Conference should weaken in its high resolve. It is a splendid gain to have the Bishops of the Anglican Communion, in conference assembled, "thankfully acknowledge that these ministries (i. e., the ministries of the non-Episcopal communions) have been manifestly blessed and owned by the Holy Spirit as effective means of grace" (the italics are not in the original). If words mean anything, these words would seem to commit the Lambeth Conference to a recognition of the validity of the ministries and sacraments of a large group of Protestant communions. Furthermore, the Episcopate is advocated as a basis for unity in organization not on the ground of any theory as to its being an exclusive channel of grace, but solely on the ground of practical expediency, namely, "that it is now, and will prove to be in the future, the best instrument for maintaining the unity and continuity of the Church."

When, however, the members of the Conference come to a definite proposal, it must be confessed that they seem to draw back from a frank recognition of the validity of "these other ministries." The proposal is made that "if the authoorities of other communions should so desire, we are persuaded that, terms of union having been otherwise satisfactorily adjusted, bishops and clergy of our Communion would willingly accept from these authorities a form of commission or recognition which would commend our ministry to their congregations, as having its place in the one family life. It is our hope that the same motive would lead ministers who have not received it to accept a commission through Episcopal ordination, as obtaining for them a ministry throughout the whole fellowship" (the italics are not in the original).

If, as the Appeal states in the premises, "we thankfully acknowledge that these ministries have been manifestly blessed and owned by the Holy Spirit as effective means of grace," why should "re-ordination" be suggested as the way of acknowledging the fact? Such a proposal logically signifies either that we attach no real importanec to ordination or that we still have a lingering doubt as to the validity of these non-Episcopal ministries.

Dr. Headlam points a more excellent way in his lectures: "If two religious bodies have thus united in their corporate capacity, each should solemnly recognize the ministers of the other and give them a commission under the new conditions. The Presbyterian, the Wesleyan, and the Congregational ministers in this country may have an adequate commission given them from their own body: they have no commission from ours. That we should give them. It may remain for further consideration how we should do it. I would only say that it should not be, in my opinion, with laying on of hands. That has already been done. The essence of a Sacrament lies in the prayers of the Church. These prayers have been offered up with the Apostolic custom of the laying on of hands. I do not think that should be repeated. The sacramental part of the rite has been performed. But the ecclesiastical rules have not been fulfilled. The essential part of them is the ordination by a bishop. That being a rule of the Church, the Church can dispense with it, and without it can confer authority on those already ordained. In the same way the other communities with which we unite may recognize our Orders and give authority in their own community to us." (Op. Cit., pp. 306-7.)

Dr. Headlam has given us in these lectures not only a scholarly examination of the historical evidence as to the origin and early development of the Christian ministry, but also an admirable exhibition of the way in which a controversial subject may be handled without loss of temper and resort to sarcasm. In a book, which affords so much opportunity for praise, it is perhaps somewhat ungenerous to call attention to two points in which it appears that the author fails to follow his own premises to logical conclusion. The two points are intercommunion and interchange of pulpits.

Dr. Headlam thus states his judgment on the subject of intercommunion: "The fundamental reason against intercommunion of the kind suggested is not doubts about Orders and Sacraments. It is the fact that we are disunited. Intercommunion such as is proposed would be just as irregular with the Roman Church and the Greek Orthodox Church as it is with the Presbyterians or Congregationalists. Let us make up our minds in what we disagree and then terminate our disunion. When that is done, then let us meet together in the Communion of the Body and Blood of Christ as the symbol of restored communion. But do not think that a half-sincere and wholly emotional common Communion will be a sound step towards reunion. I do not mean that the occasional admission of the members of other religious bodies when in danger of death or without their own religious administrations is not right. No rules should ever be pressed too rigidly. What I mean is that the proposed Corporate Communion for those who are not united will do nothing but hinder reunion, for it will not be wholly sincere." (Op. cit., p. 289.)

The question arises whether such an argument does not undermine our confidence as to the real value of the sacramental principle. The invitation to the Holy Communion in the Prayer Book liturgy is extended in these terms, "Ye who do truly and earnestly repent you of your sins, and are in love and charity with your neighbors, and intend to lead a new life, etc." Surely few of us could sincerely respond to that invitation, if we interpret it as conditioned upon the fact that we are already in a perfect state of charity with all men. Rather, we immediately proceed in the service to confess with humility that we have not yet attained, but we profess that it is our sincere desire and aim to be in love and charity with our neighbors; and thus it is we draw near in faith to take the Holy Sacrament, in order that we may thereby receive grace and strength to come nearer that which we would be.

Would not the same principles hold true as to intercommunion on the part of a group of Christians who at present belong to different communions, but who are earnestly desirous of finding a way to Christian unity? What higher interpretation could we take of the sacrament of the Holy Communion than that it is the means through which we may receive grace and strength to draw nearer to that unity? If we do not wait until we are perfectly holy before we come to the Holy Communion within our own fold, why should we wait until we have achieved "restored communion" before we of the different folds kneel at the one Lord's Table to receive grace to realize that unity which is our goal? To take a concrete illustration, suppose that a ministerial association, composed of Episcopal and non-Episcopal ministers in a given community, was earnestly conferring as to the ways and means of unifying its diverse Christian efforts in that community, what more natural step could its members take towards achieving the end in view, or what more visible pledge as to the sincerity of their purpose, than that they should receive together the Sacrament of Christian love? If we are conscious that Christ's Spirit is directing us in our deliberations and consultations, what more fitting response could there be than to ratify the fact with His own sacramental pledge of His spiritual presence?

The second point in which Dr. Headlam's argument for unity seems to halt is the proposal as to the interchange of pulpits. He thus states his position: "The proposed interchange of pulpits is a breach of Church order. Now I never think that any merely ecclesiastical rule should be looked upon as so binding that it cannot be broken, if there is any good result to be attained. There are rules which fall into desuetude and are abrogated by being found needless or inconvenient. Many of those who are keen about some rules steadily ignore others, or, what is worse, evade them by some equivocation. But what good does conduct like that really do? It will please some perhaps; but it will irritate others. It will not help us to solve any fundamental questions. Interchange of pulpits among those who are not yet agreed on the fundamental principles of faith and order must be insincere; it should follow agreement, not prepare for it." (Op. cit., pp. 289-90.)

__The Church and Christian Reunion;__ Being the Bampton Lectures for the Year 1920. By the Rev. Arthur C. Headlam, D. D. Longmans, Green & Co., London and New York.

But, one may ask, why should interchange of pulpits follow agreement rather than be used as a means of preparing the way for such agreement? Surely there can be no breach of Church order so great as the breach created by the very fact of our divisions, and any lesser rule of Church order might reasonably and ethically be sacrificed if, through its sacrifice, it might become a repairer of the great breach. It is difficult to understand how we can hope for complete agreement or reunion (that "far-off divine event"), unless we cultivate the human opportunities for intercourse and fellowship which are near at hand. If we are sincerely desirous of Christian unity, then one logical step to take would seem to be to make frequent opportunities for securing evidence to the fact that the Holy Spirit is blessing the prophets of non-Episcopal ministries. One of the chief barriers to unity is the prejudice that proceeds from ignorance. When we isolate ourselves and inhibit the practical opportunities for intercourse and understanding, it must often appear to our fellow-Christians of other communions that we are content to abide in ignorance and in disunion.

In taking exception to these two points in Dr. Headlam's argument, the writer would in no sense minimize the impression conveyed by these lectures as a whole. Dr. Headlam has given a truly valuable work on Christian institutions and has advanced one of the strongest and most courageous pleas yet made by an Episcopalian for Christian Reunion.

ECHOES OF THE CENTENNIAL MESSAGE

By the Rev. G. W. Gasque

ON Sunday, November 6, we celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Missionary Society of the Episcopal Church in the United States. It was a day of thanksgiving and praise for the broad vision and noble achievements of our fathers, a day also tempered by a devout consciousness of opportunities wasted and duty often times half done.

A great many of us had been careless and all but negligent of our personal obligations, and because of this fact, though the Church has wonderfully succeeded, yet it had not accomplished one-half what it would had we all done our part, for the Church could not do more than we and other individuals had made possible.

We learned that the first years of the society were lean years, and that not a great deal of constructive and aggressive work had been done, except by individuals here and there, and local churches now and then who had caught the vision of Christ's commission, "Go ye into all the world." But when it was conceived that "this society shall be considered as comprehending, all persons who have become in baptism members of the Church," the spread of the gospel began in earnest.

Have we fully realized yet that every single one of us are members of the society, and that we have personal responsibilities?

We were told again and made to feel on November 6 that the history of the missionary endeavor of the Church was a hundred years' story of inspiration and courage. Our hearts were strangely warmed when we saw the pioneers of the society as they carried the banner of Christ in the front ranks of civilization, over the mountains and hills, across the plains and valleys, all the way to the other side of the continent, and from thence to the islands of the Pacific, and finally to the Orient and to the uttermost parts of the earth. Did you not receive new inspiration and fresh courage?

We were told of White and Chase, Kemper and Kip, Otey and Boone, Tuttle and Hare, and scores of others whose names are writ not in water, but carved in the hearts of every true Churchman, these men and women who chose poverty and affliction with the people of God rather than to enjoy the pleasures of earthly wealth and position, who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, and turned to flight the armies of the aliens.

It was pointed out to us that as in the days of the Apostle Paul, so in the days of the nineteenth century these missionary heroes of the cross had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, and bonds and imprisonments, that they were tempted, afflicted, tormented, made destitute, and slain with the sword.

The message assured us that all these having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise of the reward of tasks completed, God having provided that we today should further develop their work, that theirs without ours should not be made perfect. Thus the lesson was brought home to us that we are partners with world builders in a master enterprise reaching back through the centuries to Christ and beyond, also reaching forward into the future until that time when His will shall be done on earth as it is done in heaven.

When the call came on November 6 for one hundred trained missionaries to fill the gaps in the ranks, were we ready to answer the call, or, if we could not qualify, did we have a son or daughter who would answer the call? This call is going to continue to come with increasing urgency.

Did we become one of the 100,000 proportionate givers to the cause? If not, why not? It is not too late. Shall we not begin today? If we have not done so before, we can now begin to set aside a certain per cent. of our income, however large or small it may be, to be given regularly, on the first day of the week, and by so doing be of genuine service to the Kingdom.

Are we now one of the 100,000 intercessors? Do we go down on our knees every day, and will we continue to do so, praying earnestly for the advancement of His Kingdom?

Did we all contribute heartily and liberally to that special fund to meet the immediate needs of the missionaries, and for the completion of buildings and other projects already started? If something prevented our contribution then, why not now send a check to the treasurer? It isn't too late.

But if you have been doing your best, if you have been doing your duty as God has pointed it out to you, as many of you have been doing, as shown by the remarkable progress of the past two years, the Centennial message only bids you to keep on.

GREEK THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY ESTABLISHED: SHOWS CO-OPERATIVE SPIRIT.

A new point of contact between the Episcopal and Greek Orthodox Churches has been established with the starting of the first Greek Theological Seminary in this country a few weeks ago.

The Seminary is named St. Athanasius', and is situated temporarily in the Central Branch of the Y. M. C. A. in Brooklyn, N. Y., until enough funds can be raised to have their own buildings. The Very Rev. Philaretos Johannides, formerly a student at our Nashotah Seminary, is dean of the new Seminary.

Seven students are now attending the classes five days each week, and more men are expected from Greece. Two of the students are college trained. The seven represent somewhat the wide distribution of the Greek people, coming as they do from Corinth, Athens, Jerusalem, Busa, Alexandria and the Dodecanese Islands.

At the request of the Metropolitan Meletios for one of our priests to teach English and American Church History, the Foreign-Born Americans Division gave permission to the Assistant Secretary, the Rev. Charles T. Bridgeman, to accept the position, pending the appointment of a permanent instructor.

THREE INDIAN GIVERS.

It is high time that we ceased forever to use the expression "Indian Giver," as one of reproach.

Hannah Eagle Star is a Dakota Indian who makes baskets as she lies on her bed, and gives to the Church the money received for them. She has been an invalid for seven years. Last Christmas her gift was ten dollars. When the Nation-Wide Campaign call came again in the summer she gave four dollars more.

Martha Grass Rope is a child of thirteen, who has been an invalid all her life. She, too, makes baskets, and her gift to the Nation-Wide Campaign offering was five dollars.

Daniel Grass Rope, appointed captain of the Campaign by the clergyman in charge of the mission to which he belongs, went all through his reservation personally educating the people, group by group, to an understanding of the missionary work of the Church.

A BISHOP'S PARISH.

Christ Church, Nashville, Tenn., has four living ex-rectors, and they are all bishops—namely, Winchester, of Arkansas; Reese, of Georgia; Mikell, of Atlanta, and Manning, of New York.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

SOCIAL SERVICE ON A WORLD SCALE.

The purpose of relief organizations of today is not simply to give money or food to the poor, but to give these things as a basis on which to build self-respect and thrift and industry that will transform an indigent family that is a constant liability to the community into a self-supporting family that becomes a permanent asset to the State.

For this reason many of the societies that do charity work are changing their names so as to get away from that epithet which in itself implies dependence. In the course of the next ten years there will probably not be an "Associated Charities" left in the country, because they will all be transformed into "Family Welfare Societies" or "General Relief Organizations" or something else which will eliminate the word which implies a state of non-support.

Now a most amazing thing has happened. A suggestion has been made that we apply these Christian principles rehabilitation to world affairs.

This proposition does not come from the president of the National Conference of Social Workers either, but from a thoroughly practical, sensible financier who has been president of one of the largest banks in this country, and is a recognized authority in the financial world—Frank A. Vanderlip, of New York.

He has returned from Europe after an exhaustive study of the chaotic financial system abroad, and as a result of his observations he has evolved a scheme by which, he believes, Europe may pay its debt to America and yet by so doing be "regenerated" rather than further impoverished. To that end, he would have America "make a grand gesture in international relations."

In brief, the gesture he would have this country make is: to obtain frank acknowledgment by every foreign nation of the debt owed to America; the arrangement of easy terms by which this debt could be liquidated; the devoting of the payments thus made to the rehabilitation of European finance, economics, public works and culture. In other words, the "gesture" he proposes means for this country to agree for these foreign debtors to discharge their indebtedness to us in installments covering an indefinite length of time by a species of bookkeeping, in which this country would be notified from time to time of the readiness of the debtor nations to credit payments on its account with them, such payments to be immediately recredited to them for national rehabilitation purposes.

This means nothing more nor less than the application of modern Christian social service to the world at large.

When we pause to consider that Russia is already practically, if not actually, bankrupt, that the German mark whose par value is $28, is down to one-third of one cent; that England is proposing a moratorium and France a receivership for the former empire of the Kaiser, it brings home to us the importance of taking immediate steps to prevent an international catastrophe.

It is announced that Mrs. Vanderlip is going to take the stump to create public sentiment in favor of her husband's plan.

Here is an opportunity for ministers throughout the country to use the influence of the pulpit to turn people's minds toward Christian principles applied to a world community.

PITCHING AND PREACHING.

A young man recently graduated at one of our theological seminaries and took charge of a country parish.

At college he had been very successful in all kinds of athletics, and had particularly enjoyed and excelled at baseball, being an exceptionally good pitcher. Indeed, at one time he was offered a large salary to pitch on professional teams. Of course he declined such an opportunity, for it was an opportunity from a financial point of view.

The question was, should he scrap his ability as a pitcher because he had become a preacher?

It did not take him long to decide. Like every man who does a thing well, he loved to do it. He did not see why he should give up an innocent pleasure because he was a preacher.

He may have remembered our Saviour's words in his last great sermon for His disciples, when He said, "I pray not that thou wouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil" (Jno. 17:15).

So this young parson began preaching—and pitching.

His work was in the country. He organized a baseball team at the county seat, and took the team all over that county and the adjoining county in a successful series of games.

Many people who watched his excellent performance in the box on Saturday afternoon would come to church on Sunday morning to see if he could do as well in the pulpit.

His ministry has been immensely, almost triumphantly, successful. He has literally pitched himself into the hearts of the people—all the people, not just the Episcopalians—in that section wherein his parish lies.

Of course his success has not been entirely due to his pitching. He has followed up the curved balls he sent out of his box on Saturday afternoons with straight talks from his pulpit on Sunday morning.

He has delivered His Master's message of love, truth, mercy and gentleness at the same time that he has been demonstrating the power of the sound physical prowess with which his heavenly Father endowed and blessed him.

He has proved to those good country people that a preacher can be a man, a real, live athletic man, without injuring his ministry.

In another of our Southern seminaries there is a young athlete studying for the ministry.

He was voted the best all-round man at athletics in his university before he went to the seminary.

When a man takes the first step towards entering the ministry he becomes what is called a "postulant," and then he has to make answer to his Bishop to certain formal questions.

One of these questions is, "What is your reason for entering the ministry?"

In answer to that question, this postulant said in substance: "Because I think the ministry is a man's job. I want to be a man, and in order to be a man I feel that I must be a minister."

Of course, all this does not mean that only athletes should apply for Holy Orders, but it does mean that any gift or faculty with which God has endowed us can be used for His honor and glory, whether it be a strong and skilful right arm, a good voice, a true ear for music, or a general pleasant disposition.

Nor do we mean to imply that the ministry is the only place where these qualities can be used for God's purpose.

If you have ability or admirable quality you can always use it to make your own community more of the sort of place that God would like to have us live in.

Furthermore, if you have no outstanding quality, there is one that you can develop, and that is a love for your fellow-beings that will shine forth in Christian service.

PEACE PETITION MILE LONG.

WASHINGTON, Nov. —(Capital News Service).—A petition more than a mile in length and containing around 200,000 individual signatures, as well as the signatures of presidents of women's organizations with a total membership of more than 2,000,000, was presented to Secretary of State Hughes recently, approving the objects of the Conference on Disarmament and urging continued work to the end that peace throughout the world be assured for the future.

Dr. Shipman Consecrated at Impressive Service in the Cathedral of St. John the Devine

The consecration of the Rev. Dr. Herbert Shipman, for fifteen years rector of Heavenly Rest Parish, New York, to be Suffragan Bishop of New York, which took place in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on St. Andrew's Day, had a martial color as befitted one who was for nine years chaplain of the Army at West Point, and who served during the war as a chaplain in France. The New York Chapter of the Military Order of the World War sent into the procession as it entered the Cathedral Brigadier General S. H. Wolfe, Colonel Thatcher P. Luguir, Colonel W. A. Carleton, Lieutenant Colonel Noel B. Fox, Lieutenant J. M. Thompson and Chaplains Chambler, Smith and Swan.

In the procession was also represented the Eastern Orthodox Church in the person of Bishop Parker and his chaplains, while Commander Freeeman, U. S. N., and Lieuteenant Colonel Price, U. S. A., assisted in raking the offertory. The service of consecration was preceded by the formal recognition of Bishop Lloyd as Suffragan of New York. From lack of service in the Prayer Book, Bishop Manning formulated one, which proved very impressive. Taking place on the steps at the entrance to the sanctuary, it was in view of all. Bishop Manning, holding the Suffragan by the right hand, formally received him, after which Bishop Lloyd knelt in silent prayer. Then Bishop Manning recited the prayer for a Bishop, which appears at the very end of the Prayer Book service.

The aged Bishop Tuttle was the consecrator, and Bishops Manning, of New York, and Lines, of Newark, assisted. The presentors were Bishops Cook, of Delaware, and Ward, of Erie, and the attending presbyters the Rev. Drs. Cummins, of Poughkeepsie, and Sedgwick, of New York. Other Bishops present were Talbot, of Bethlehem; Acheson, of Connecticut; Davenport, of Easton; Colmore, of Porto Rico; Overs, of Liberia; Boyd Vincent, of Southern Ohio, and Rhinelander, of Pennsylvania.

About two hundred clergy were in the procession. The sermon was preached by Bishop Thomas, of Wyoming. In part he said:

"As I look about me I see in this city, to whose tasks three Bishops for the first time in the history of our Church will address themselves, the most changing population of any city the world has ever seen. Hither have gathered in amazing numbers representatives of all the peoples of the world, bringing with them such rejections of the past as to invade in many instances their hitherto most cherished beliefs and devotions.

"Changes in religious habit of thought and worship are wont to follow changes elsewhere. The vital problems of this city are appalling in their immensity and in their complexity. Greeks, Slavs, Turks and the immigrants from Asia, Europe, Africa and the islands of these, the great majority of this seething mass are religiously not being reached by an organized endeavor.

"To pursue the primrose path of pure Anglican theology amid such a company will satisfy the few, but will certainly lose the masses. To make overtures to medievalists here who are rapidly losing their medievalism seems obviously unsound. To sell our birthright for a mess of pottage to appease the clamor of a weakening Protestantism seems equally unwise. So colossal a task can only be performed with methods susceptible of change, not simply over narrow boundaries, but extending over great areas.

"London, Berlin and Paris have their problems, but they are essentially English, French and German problems. But the problems of New York, with its great foreign population and its mixture of all races, is a world problem."

"Serious danger attends every elevation. Remain what I believe you to be, an earnest seeker after truth, a loyal servant of your Master. Change not in your moral purposes. Stand where your allegiance to your Saviour compels you to stand.

"I know not what your place will be in this city, nor the work which will be assigned you to do. But I know that today you are to be consecrated to the office and work of Bishop in the Church of God. The necessities of jurisdiction and the needs of men have found it desirable to make distinctions and degrees within this office, but the office itself is one and the same, than which there is no place higher in the Church of God, partly for which you will be very much alone. Grieve not for this, but be humbly thankful that, like your Master, you will be accounted worthy not only to bear shame in His name, but to suffer loneliness, reproach and sorrow."

The plan of two Suffragan Bishops is that there are to be no archdeacons as heretofore. It is understood, however, that one Suffragan is not to be assigned to Church extension work, and another to another line of work, but that the entire work of the Diocese, never forgetting the rural districts, is to be carried on as a unit, the Suffragans fitting in as needed, and the Bishop himself endeavoring at all times to keep in close personal touch with the clergy, for spiritual counsel, and as far as possible with all other forms of service.

C.

The Centennial in Shanghai

I have heard four sermons today of goodly length (one of them by myself) on the one hundred years' work of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, and while it is fresh in my mind I would like to tell the readers of the Southern Churchman something of how we observed the Centennial in Shanghai.

At the Communion services in the morning at the Procathedral and in all five of our Shanghai churches, special thanksgivings and prayers were offered and the clergy were requested to speak on the work of the society. At All Saints' we had two such services, one for our congregation of American Churchmen and one for the Chinese congregation.

At 3 o'clock in the afternoon a mass meeting of the Shanghai churches was held in the Church of Our Saviour. The program was as follows:

(1) Processional hymn: "Onward, Christian Soldiers."
(2) Creed and prayers.
(3) Announcement of the gift to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, as a thank offering, of a lot owned by the parish in another part of the city.
(4) Hymn: "From Greenland's Icy Mountains."
(5) Address by Dr. Pott, the senior American presbyter of the Diocese.
(6) Anthem by the choir.
(7) Hymn: "Jesus Shall Reign."
(8) Address by Mr. Tai, the senior Chinese presbyter of the Diocese.
(9) Anthem by the choir.
(10) Music by the school band during the taking of the offering.
(11) Prayers and benediction, followed by the "Sevenfold Amen."
(12) Recessional hymn: "O Sion, Haste."

The brass band of twenty-six pieces and the vested choir of about the same number of men and boys had been trained by Mr. Elliot Tsu, a son of the rector and a graduate of St. John's University, who is now teaching in the parish school, and the music certainly did him credit. It was nothing short of marvelous to hear the sounds evoked from one of the big horns by a small boy who might almost have crawled inside it. The parish, by the way, is just completing a fine new school building, which will cost them over $30,000 (Mexican), none of which comes from America.

Statistics are apt to be dry and are sometimes misleading, but it is interesting to compare some figures. One hundred years ago the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society raised $7,000 for its work. The budget of the Missionary Society of the Church in China this year calls for exactly the same amount in Mexican money, which is considerably more than half as much in our money at the present rate of exchange. Last year the church in the Diocese of Kiangsu alone reported contributions from Chinese sources of $16,064.87 (Mexican), about one-third more than the society had for its first year's work a hundred years ago.

The collections taken at all the services today throughout the Diocese will be sent to the Church Missions House as a thank offering for what the society has done for China during these past one hundred years.

Seventy-five years ago last Easter the first Chinese member of our Church was baptized by Bishop Boone. He lived to become the first Chinese rector of the Church of Our Saviour. One had but to look at the congregation of Christians that worshipped in that church this afternoon and remember that they were but a very small part of the Church in China, in order to realize something of how the work of the Society has been blessed in this land.

THE WEAKNESS OS PITY.

The practical weakness of the vast mass of modern pity for the poor and the oppressed is precisely that it is merely pity; the pity is pitiful, but not respectful. Men feel that the cruelty to the poor is a kind of cruelty to animals. They never feel that it is injustice to equals; nay, it is treachery to comrades. This dark, scientific pity, this brutal pity, has an elemental sincerity of its own, but it is entirely useless for all ends of social reform.—G. K. Chesterton.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

PROPORTIONATE GIVING AND APPORTIONMENT.

Mr. Editor: When the General Convention meets next autumn and takes up the subject of the Nation-Wide Campaign, it will do well to consider recommending throughout the Church proportionate giving on the basis of George Wharton Pepper's reasonable pamphlet. Tithing is commendable in all, and it is to be doubted if any one has ever been worse off for the practice. I have heard that there is a considerable sum of money on deposit in a bank in one of our States to be paid to the first person who has practiced tithing and found his personal accounts seriously injured thereby. However, it must be admitted that tithing was not the same matter when much of it could be paid in produce as it is under our highly developed system of monetary exchange and credit. Proportionate giving, like the income tax, takes into account the varying amounts of income, the unequal responsibilities of individuals and families, and advises a sliding scale of percentage. This should be studied before the next General Convention and taught and advocated broadcast. The same system should be studied to determine parochial and diocesan quotas in the Nation-Wide Campaign for the Church's Mission. Basing the apportionment upon fundamental parochial expenses, the percentage should vary from perhaps as low as 10 per cent for poor parishes and missions up to 200 per cent. or even more for the wealthiest parishes. The same can be made applicable to dioceses, and is in effect in the Diocese of Harrisburg. Furthermore, peculiar responsibilities, such as missions, institutional work, eleemosynary institutions, charitable demands, etc., should be taken into account. Just as a man with a large family cannot give the same proportion of the same income as a bachelor, so missionary dioceses and parishes in poor quarters cannot give the same as those in well-favored sections. The chief objection to this is that proportionate giving might produce proportionate thinking, and make wealthy individuals, churches and dioceses flame with missionary zeal, while the poor might become parochially minded. This should be guarded against. Nevertheless, if the Church's mission were considered one thing instead of two or more, people would think of the whole and remain catholic minded under any condition. Another matter the next Nation-Wide Campaign should advise for most parishes is an increase in the new budgets for parochial advance. If every year parishes that need it made provision for some advance either in staff, equipment, insurance or adequate salaries, the producing power of the Church would grow. The Church has a head today and it is using its head. That fact is inspiring men with confidence in the business administration of the Church. The next General Convention should make constructive and sane advance.

APPRECIATION.

Mr. Editor: Just a line to thank you heartily for giving the Advent Corporate Communion effort of the Brotherhood such a splendid place in the issue of November 26 of the Southern Churchman. It is of course too early to form an accurate idea of how successful this National Corporate Communion was this year, but such reports as have already been received in the Brotherhood's National Office indicate a very widespread participation in this movement throughout the entire Church.

Again thanking you sincerely for your prominent mention of the effort in the Southern Churchman, I am, with sincere regard, Ever yours, SUGGESTION FOR RECRUITING POSTER.

Mr. Editor: Your idea of a poster used as an appeal for recruits to the ministry seems to me an excellent one. On reading it today my thoughts turned at once to the story of the great Captain's call to that very valuable recruit, Matthew or Levi.

The story, as it is told, especially in St. Luke's gospel, 5:27, 28, is particularly suggestive. E. g., Levi, as a tax gatherer, had a much better chance, by fair means or foul, to "make money" than was possible by following Jesus through Galilee, or writing that splendid history of doings and saying. Yet St. Luke says that, without debate or excuse, "he left all, rose up and followed Him."

Certainly he has done more for the world and left a better monument to his own memory than any publican, ancient or modern, has ever done by sticking to the "tables of the money-changers."

If nothing better comes to you, maybe this is worth considering. LANDON R. MASON.

AN INTERESTING MISSION.

Mr. Editor: Two and a half miles southwest of Grace Memorial Church, Lynnwood, Va., is Port Republic, and two miles south of Port Republic is Grottoes. Roads run from these two points towards the Blue Ridge Mountains, meeting about half a mile north of the historic Brown's Gap, which connects Rockingham and Albemarle Counties. It was at this point that for years I had a flourishing mission, having eleven communicants, fifty baptized children, and a Sunday school attendance of sixty or seventy. This mission was abandoned a number of years ago, but was reopened this past summer at a point called Richland Heights, half a mile from the first.

Having at present no building of our own, and using the Richland Heights Club House for our services, by courtesy of its community, we did not attempt to organize a Sunday school, but contented ourselves with holding services there every other Sunday. Many of the old mission have scattered and drifted—especially the then children—but many also have come to the services, besides a number of the people of Richland Heights. These last show up quite an array of denominations—Church of England, Episcopal, Presbyterian, Baptist, Christian, Roman Catholic—but each has been represented at the services, and they have requested that our present rector give them at least one service a month to hold them together till spring, when we hope to find a way to start a Sunday school and other work. This the rector, Rev. Frank Stanford Persons, has consented to do; while I drive the six miles every fair weather intervening Sunday and hold Episcopal singings, using a small, weak organ given years ago to the Brown's Gap Mission. These singings are being enthusiastically attended, and the people are now learning the chants and the season hymns.

My object in writing this letter is to ask—by their request—if any one who may read it has a good, full-volumed, flat-topped organ that he or she would be willing to sell us for a, perhaps, more than reasonable sum. A good organ is especially needed at that point, as, not being as young as I once was, I find it difficult to pump the organ, play, and lead the singing for a crowd utterly unfamiliar with either chanting or the hymns, no matter how enthusiastic they may be.

Many of the Richland Heights people can sing more or less by note, and being educated people, are catching on remarkably well; so that with a good, full-toned organ, I think we could soon have an excellent choir, which would greatly minimize the training of the rest of the congregation. Trusting that this appeal might strike the right eye, I remain, Yours very sincerely,

WORLD BROTHERHOOD TO BE THEME OF ANNUAL MEETING OF FEDERAL COUNCIL.

"The Church and World Brotherhood" is the theme which, from various angles, will be discussed at the annual meeting of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America at Chicago, December 14 to 16. The sessions are to be held in the new First Congregational Church, the Chicago Church Federation serving as the host of the meeting.

The morning and afternoon sessions throughout the meeting are to be devoted to a consideration of the programs and policies of the churches in co-operative fields, some of the more important subjects for discussion being: "How Can the Churches Work Together in Their Central Task of Evangelism," opened by Rev. Howard Agnew Johnston; "Is a More Unified Program of Christian Education on the Part of the Churches Now Possible," opened by Dr. Robert L. Kelly, Executive Secretary of the Council of Church Boards of Education; "What Advances Are Now Possible in Co-operative Service to the Community," opened by Rev. William Chalmers Covert, of Chicago; "The Need for a Common Mind Within the Church," opened by Professor William Adams Brown, chairman of the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook; and "How Can We Co-operate More Fully With the Churches of Europe," opened by Rev. W. W. Pinson, General Secretary of the Board of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

AMONG THE HOLIDAY BOOKS

Calendars.

THE CHURCH CALENDAR. Published by The Churchman Co. Price $1.25.

THE CHURCH MISSIONARY CALENDAR. Published by The Educational Department of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. Price 40 cents.

Both of these calendars are admirable, and deserve wide use for the particular purposes for which they are adapted to serve.

The first should be in the room of every Altar Guild and of every rector, too. It has been prepared by four presbyters whose point of view about the Church is broad and living. It includes not only a church calendar, week by week, with the indication of Saints' Day services. the colors for the Church vestments and hangings, and the appointed lessons for Morning and Evening Prayer, but also paragraphs of devotion and information, selected with singular care and helpfulness. There are also additional pages of suggestions for Altar Guilds. The whole arrangement and message of the calendar will help to make the Church year more full of beauty and intelligent worshipfulness for those who follow it. It is well printed, with a handsome cover in red and green and gold.

The Church Missionary Calendar, printed in book form. with attractive heavy paper cover of blue and gold and gray, is useful also as a calendar for those who are arranging the services and marking the lessons in the Church, but it is more particularly valuable as a sort of "daily strength" of information and inspiration about the Church's missionary work. For each day of the year there is a brief paragraph telling some fact about a particular point in the Church's mission fields at home or abroad. At the end is a valuable directory of missionaries, listing the names of all our workers, men and women, in each one of the domestic and foreign fields.

Books for Children.

ZODIAC TOWN. By Nancy Byrd Turner, Illustrated by Winifred Bromhall. The Atlantic Monthly Press, Boston. Pp. 131. $1.50.

Miss Turner's name is one of happy associations for many who have read in other years the Family Department and the pages for young people in the Southern Churchman; and to them, and to a widening company of new friends, "Zodiac Town" will bring delight. It is the whimsical story of a little boy and a little girl who go with the Journeying Man to the country where the months have their houses, and there is much to see and much to say, in prose and playful rhyme.

The attractiveness of the book is vastly enhanced by the illustrations. These have been done by Miss Winifred Bromhall, a young English artist who contributes to this book her first work in America; and altogether charming work it is.

WHAT THE WILD FLOWERS TELL US. Dudley O. Osterheld. Fleming H. Revell Co. Pp. 191. $1.50.

As the practice of preaching to children grows more frequent, the books are multiplying which represent the work of men who are leaders in this ministry. Many of these are of the same general character, some a little better, some a little less good, but not strikingly differentiated in conception and treatment one from the other. But here is a book which does blaze a new path, and a path that leads straight to lovely and pleasant places. Its sub-title is "Nature Talks With Young Folks," and all the sermons have some wild flower as their text. They will be useful not only for ministers, but for all friends of children who take the boys and girls with them into the fields. The value of the book is heightened by delightful illustrations done by the author himself, and also by an index of suggested texts for those who wish to turn his chapters into sermons.

SUNNY WINDOWS. By W. Russell Bowie. Fleming H. Revell Co. Pp. 190. Price $1.25.

Although this book has been out nearly a year, its popularity is unabated, and it is now running in its second edition.

It contains forty-six story sermons that take about five minutes for reading or delivering. The great quality about this material is that, to one who frequently has to address children, it is ready for use at once, and is very suggestive and helpful in preparing further addresses.

On the other hand, the stories are so simple and well connected with either persons or things that children will enjoy them, and the moral, though not too obtrusive, is sufficiently clear to need no "grown-up" explanation.

BOOKS OF RELIGIOUS INTEREST.

THE MINISTRY. By Charles Lewis Slattery. Charles Scribner's Sons. Pp. x., 198. $1.25.

This little volume by the distinguished rector of Grace Church, New York, will be valuable beyond all reckoning. Often men and women who love the Church and are eager to help in recruiting men for the ministry have wished for some brief yet adequate setting forth of the meaning of a minister's work and its call to the finest spirits among our youth. Dr. Slattery's book answers this need with noble sufficiency. It is difficult to imagine how the call to the ministry could be sounded with a richer blending of spiritual eloquence, fertile suggestion and persuasive fact.

Here are the subjects of the chapters: The Call of Every Man; What the Ministry Is; The Essentials of a Call to the Ministry; Types Useful for the Ministry; The Preparation; The Specific Opportunity; The Necessity of the Ministry; the Compensations of the Ministry.

THE RUIN OF ANCIENT CIVILIZATION AND THE TRIUMPH OF CHRISTIANITY. By Guglielmo Ferrero. G. P. Putnam's Sons. Pp. vii., 210. $2.50.

The interest of this volume by the brilliant Italian historian is further indicated by its sub-title, "With Some Consideration of Conditions in the Europe of Today." Tersely and clearly Ferrero reviews the conditions which led to the internal decomposition and the final collapse of the Roman Empire aftere the death of Alexander Severus in 235. In that year, he points out, the ancient civilization was still intact, with at least all the outward seeming of its magnificence as impressive as it had ever been. Fifty years later all this was changed, and the whole religious, social and economic fabric of the empire had fallen into chaos.

The chief cause for this collapse Ferrero finds in the destruction of the principle of authority within the Roman State. The original Roman stock had lost its virility of leadership. As an institution, the Senate had declined in power because the men of character who once made it great had vanished, and in their place had come a class enfeebled by luxury and no longer capable in strength and purpose of shouldering the great weight of the empire's administration. With the downfall of the old authority of government came the collapse of the principle of authority itself, until the empire became a welter of anarchic forces struggling uncertainly for mastery.

The mirror which Ferrero fashions from the ancient centuries and holds up to the face of life today must give us pause as we catch in it reflections of facts which we recognize among ourselves. Like Viscount Bryce's noble work, Modern Democracies, this volume challenges the patriotic earnestness of thoughtful men to consider whether or not we are building up in our own faithfulness to civic responsibility safeguards of order and peace which are essential if our modern civilization is not to go its way to join the great failures of the past.

DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS. Edited by Shailer Mathews and Gerald Birney Smith. The Macmillan Company. Pages 513. $8.00.

This newest edition to the reference books on religion and ethics has been created by two members of the faculty of the University of Chicago, with the co-operation of a large number of other specialists. The fact that it originates in that University and its Divinity School makes one know in advance that it will represent the modern view in Biblical criticism and in the study of comparative religions. This it does reflect and yet, withal, its tone is reverent and, in the main, constructive.

One difficulty which a book of this sort must reckon with is the fact that the subjects which fall under the head of religion and ethics are so multitudinous that their treatment in a single volume makes it necessary that some of them should be dismissed with the barest summary. As against this, however, stands the obvious advantage of having a work of reference, not too expensive to be included in the average small library and Sunday school collection, through which one can find at least the open gateway of suggestion to the knowledge which he seeks. The space given to the different articles has been carefully, and on the whole most skillfully proportioned so that, whereas the minor subjects are summed up in terse paragraphs, there are on the most vital themes articles of sufficient length to give a helpful conception of the subject in its completeness. The article on Christianity, for example, covers four pages and a half, that on the Church of England a page and a half, and that on the Missionary Movement somewhat more than two pages. It is obvious, of course, that in this compass there can be no exhaustive treatment of these great themes, but it is also obvious—and this is the point of value—that this dictionary gives a great deal more than mere definition of those subjects for the sake of which one will turn to it most.

A feature of the book which is especially gratifying is its reflection of aspects of our religious life which are immediately contemporary. Many books of reference seem even by the time they are issued to be memorials of yesterday rather than sensitive mirrors of today, but this book is extraordinary in its freshness. The article, for example, on the World Conference on Faith and Order brings the news of this almost up to the present day. The articles on the Student Volunteer Movement, on the Social Gospel and Social Service of the Church also indicate the living quality of the book.

The wise reader will consult this book, and every book of reference, with discrimination, not accepting all its pronouncements as infallible, but weighing them as the honest utteranecs of scholars who try to present with sincerity the facts as they believe them to be. Some of the positions taken depart much further from the traditional conception than seems to the present reviewer defensible, as, for example, Professor Scott's suggestion in his article on Jesus Christ, that the Master did not become convinced of his own Messiahship until a considerable time after the baptism by John. But views with which one disagrees may be not hurtful, but only stimulating, if one consults a book of reference not with the idea that everything written there must be believed because it is so printed, but in order to seek approaches toward truth which one must test always with independent judgment.

PEKING. A SOCIAL SURVEY. By Sidney D. Gamble. Assisted by John S. Burgess. George H. Doran Company. Pages xxiii, 538. $5.00.

This is a book of monumental importance, the like of which has never been wrought before. It is the first social survey ever made of an oriental city, and having been made with great thoroughness under the auspices of the Princeton University Center in China and the Peking's Young Men's Christian Association, it is here presented in a large volume in admirable simplicity of arrangement and with many illustrations from charts and photographs. The fact that such a book is possible shows the mighty way in which the Christian leaven permeates all the human problems of great nations, so that the Kingdom of God appears not only as the evangelization of individuals, but as the transformation of the whole structure of a people's life. "An army of more than six thousand missionaries and 23,000 Chinese workers," says Mr. G. Sherwood Eddy in his preface of the book, "is striving to change the hearts of men, and in the evangelistic and educational missions in China the primary emphasis is placed upon personal regeneration. There is urgent need, however, for the social application of Christian principles upon the mission field. First of all, the membership of the infant Church needs a social gospel both as a field and as a force for social service. The Christian forces must be the leaders in the development of new and higher types of life in other lands. The timeliness of the Peking Survey is further emphasized by the fact that the Church at home is beginning to realize the importance of social and industrial problems, and by the rapid social changes occurring in China itself."

HOW WE GOT OUR BIBLE. Illustrated. By J. Paterson Smyth, D. D. Jas. Pott & Co. Pp. 153.

You hear of the "King James Version" and the Revised Version of the Bible, and of course you know that they mean two of the most important translations of the Bible, but what languages were these translations made from? How were the oldest manuscripts kept, and where? Were there other versions before the King James? Why are there changes and differences betweeen the King James and the Revised. These are some of the questions that are answered in this little book, "How We Got Our Bible."

They are answered, too, in such an interesting way that even persons who are not religiously inclined will thoroughly enjoy reading it. We learn what "textual criticism" means in language that the ordinary person can understand. We go away back into the early Christian world and watch the manuscripts which form our Bible.

Further on, the reader gets a vivid picture of the old English historian and scholar translating the Gospel, and one feels the tense strain of the death cahmber of the Venerable Bede as with his shortened breath he dictated the last words of St. John's gospel. Let us quote from page 51: "Bede dictated: 'It is finished, Master,' cried the youth, raising his head as the last word was written. 'Ay, it is finished,' echoed the dying saint. 'Lift me up. Place me at that window, where I have so often prayed to God. Now, glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost.' And with these words the beautiful spirit passed to the presence of the eternal Trinity."

This scene occurred more than a thousand years ago, but you live it as you read it in "How We Got Our Bible." It is a book that should be in every home.

BOOKS OF TRAVEL AND OF WORLD AFFAIRS.

ROVING EAST AND ROVING WEST. By E. V. Lucas. George H. Doran Co. Pp. 223. $2.00.

A book which one may read straight through or bit by bit at odd moments, and find full of rewarding pleasure either way. It is made up of many very brief chapters recording the impressions of a sensitive observer as he traveled in India, Japan and America, and the reading of them is like looking through windows at sudden vistas full of the color and pageantry of many lands. Memorable especially are the chapters on Delhi and the ruined cities round it where lived the Mogul kings.

WHAT JAPAN THINKS. By K. K. Kawakami. The Macmillan Co. Pp. 237. $2.00.

The title of this book would immediately suggest its value to all persons who are alert to the currents of discussion in our world affairs today. We need to know what Japan thinks if we are to understand those unseen factors of mind and spirit which underlie all questions of armament and far eastern policy and peace in the Pacific.

This book is made up of fourteen chapters gathered by a Japanese editor and representing articles originally written for the most part in Japanese for the Japanese. They discuss such subjects as Mikadoism, Liberalism in Japan, Militarism and Navalism in America, Japan's Navalism, and Can Japan Be Christianized? The chapters represent many points of view. "Some of them," as the editor says, "may be found unpleasant to sedate readers in America and Europe." But the interesting and hopeful feature of the book is that it shows that in Japan, as in other countries, there is a liberal element reaching out after the ideals of peace and co-operation which the best men in all nations desire, and that the hope of the world tomorrow lies in the strengthening of these liberal elements everywhere through mutual encouragement and confidence.

THE PACIFIC TRIANGLE. By Sydney Greenbie. The Century Company. Pp. xv, 402. $4.00.

An octavo volume of 400 pages, handsomely printed, with eighty-six photographic illustrations and a map. Its subject matter and its style would make it interesting at any time, but in these days, when the problem of the relationship of the nations bordering on the Pacific is made a matter of daily newspaper discussion in connection with the Disarmament Conference, it possesses a vivid and special importance.

"The plan of the book," says the author in his preface, "has been to give the historical approach to the Pacific and its native races; then to take the reader upon a journey of over 20,000 miles around the Pacific. I hope that he will come away with a clear impression of the immensity of the ocean, of the diversity of its natural and human elements, and the splendor and picturesqueness of its make-up. Out of this review certain problems emerge, the problems of the relations of native alien races, of marriages and divorces, of markets and ideals—problems that affect the primitive races in their own new place in the world. But over and above and about these come the issues that involve the more advanced races of Asia, Australasia and America—where they impinge upon each other and where their interests in these minor races center. This is the logic of the Pacific."

The message of the book is thoroughly wholesome and helpful in those matters where we need both a clear facing of immediate facts and a true vision of far ends to guide us in our international complications. Mr. Greenbie is frank in his analysis of racial difficulties, and especially in his setting forth of the imperialistic elements in the policy of Japan. The question of the treatment of China is of course the crucial point where the policies of America and Japan impinge, but Mr. Greenbie believes that in spite of difficulties, a just agreement is likely to be reached. His book is a plea for wider education and intelligent sympathy between the peoples whose public opinion will determine international policies in the Pacific.

THE COMING OF THE SON OF MAN

An Advent Sermon by the Rev. W. Cosby Bell, D. D.

"Henceforth ye shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power and coming on the clouds of heaven." —Matt. 26:64.

Again it is the Advent season, and again the Church calls us to lift up our hearts to the thought of the coming of Christ, our Lord. But though faith in that coming lives always in the heartr of the Church, it does not always live with the full vividness and richness that rightly belong to it. To many of us, perhaps, it is no more than a remote event at the end of history, without much claim upon our present interest or bearing on our present lives. But, indeed, if that is so, it is because we have not adequately grasped the Advent message. The New Testament thought in this connection is much deeper and more varied than a casual glance at a few passages enables us to see. Jesus Himself speaks of His coming in a variety of ways. His sayings do not all refer to one event or to one kind of event, but rather to a variety of events and processes of different kinds. Sometimes He spoke of His presence in the world then as a coming: "I am come to seek and to save them that are lost." Sometimes it is a coming to the disciples through the resurrection: "Ye now therefore have sorrow, but I will see you again and your sorrow shall be turned into joy." Sometimes it is a spiritual coming to His followers which amounts to a perpetual presence with them: "If a man love Me and keep My word, My Father will love him and we will come to Him and make our abode with Him." Sometimes it is a coming for judgment in the processes of history—sometimes it is coming at the end of this earthly phase of human life. And sometimes it is a wider and more continuous coming which seems to include all these—which begin there in His earthly ministry and goes on unceasingly—which Christians can always see: "Henceforth [St. Luke has 'from this time on'] ye shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven."

Indeed, the very variety of the sayings of Jesus in this connection shows that His mind is fixed upon some one fundamental thing which may take different forms and be described in different ways. And it is that permanent heart of the Advent faith that we must look for, if we wish, not just to reproduce the imagery of Jesus, but to discover the truth that He means to teach. And surely that central truth is just the promise of the growing presence and power of God through Christ in human life. That is the perpetual advent, of which He suggests various forms; that is the central thing that He has in mind, whether He is speaking of His incarnation, or His resurrection, or His coming "at the end of the age." These are all moments in one movement, examples of one principle, partial fulfilments of one purpose. And that purpose is the complete coming of Christ into human life and the complete Christianization of human society. And if we take the teaching of the Bible as a whole, instead of sticking to just a few passages, we can see that the Christian faith is faith in a Christ who has come, who has always been coming, and who will never stop coming until His kingdom is complete.

Indeed, the two phrases that we commonly use, "The First Advent" and "The Second Advent," do not really express the New Testament thought. For there are, not two, but many comings, and all the comings are linked up together as parts of one process. They are like the successive waves that break upon the seashore, each reaching further than the last, but all of them the expression of a single tidal movement in which the sea is pressing inward toward the land. The words "I will come" must be held in relationship with those other words, "Wherever two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them." We do not have to calculate the time of Christ's coming; we know the time; it is always. We know the place; it is in the open fields of history. We know the purpose; it is to destroy evil and create goodness; it is to build the kingdom of God.

If we take the Christian faith in this its widest, deepest and truest form, we look back to see past history with new eyes. For then it is no longer the tragic story of a hope forever being deferred; it is the splendid story of a promise forever being fulfilled. For, indeed, wherever in the long past there has been an increase of true religion and Christian goodness in the world, there has been something—just so much—of the advent of Christ. So He came long ago in the impulse that sent the early Church out to begin the work of world-conquest—in her heart the memory of His promise, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." He came to pagan Greece and Rome in the centuries that followed, and laid His transforming hand upon classic civilization. He came into the wild forests of the north and taught the barbarian to bow to a power stronger than the sword. And yet again and in a different way He came in the great struggle of the Reformation, so that after it had passed,

A CALL FOR A COVENANT OF CHURCH UNITY.

Put Forth on November 30 by the Commission on Unity of the National Congregational Council.

At this time the leading nations of the world are entering into a covenant of ten years for the realignment of their military forces for the sake of keeping the peace of the world; shall not the churches of Christ do likewise? Shall the diplomats of the world be wiser for this generation than are the leaders of the churches? At this historic hour the people throughout our churches are waiting for some clear call to make common cause of their means and their sacrifices that we may live in a Christian world.

Surely this is no time for tarrying in theological consultations or standing idly within ecclesiastical limitations. Now our spiritual unity needs to be made so visible that the man on the street may see it.

"The way to resume is to resume."

The last National Council of the Congregational Churches, in June, 1921, expressed the belief "that the evangelization of the world rests in a united Church." The Council gave its Commission on Unity ample authorization to confer with other commissions' aid in effecting ths unity. A Joint Commission of the Episcopal and the Congregational Churches has had for some time under favorable consideration a Concordat, for common ministry in particular cases, the recent Lambeth Conference of Anglican Bishops, held in London last June, going still further in this direction in a message "to all their fellow-believers" looked forward to a larger organic fellowship in a ministry of the whole Church. These proposals call for responsive action.

As Congregationalists, we can speak only for ourselves. But that nothing may be lacking on our part, we would declare our immediate readiness to confer with representatives of any other churches concerning any realignments or unification of our respective forces and ministries that may be proposed. In particular, among the desirable objectives for combined action we would be willing to consider means for the attainment ofthe following ends:

1. The mutual recognition and utilization of the ministry of the different churches for common needs and service in all.

2. The offering thereby of larger fields and greater incentive to enter the ministry to our young men, as well as limiting the number of ministers required for effective service at home, where one may be better than two or more.

3. More gradually, but possibly within the period of this ten years' covenant of peace, such consolidations or combinations of the educational institutions and their means of the different churches might be brought about as would prove advantageous for the best education, and fellowship in their studies, of the ministers of the of the following ends:

4. And for any philanthropic, social, mission or federated service of the churches.

The governments of this world are co-operating for the common good. Shall the Churches of Christ do less for His Kingdom?

men looked up and found themselves in a new world face to face with a newly-discovered Christ. Even while men were looking for His second advent, He had come, and turned their penance into service and quickened their liturgies into prayers and entered a step deeper into the lives of men.

So the past is full of His advent, and Christian history is the story of His coming with increasing power and great glory. If slavery is now admitted for an evil thing; if the standards of character and conduct are better than those of a thousand years ago; if in our day a sense of the brotherhood of human life is beginning to work as leaven in the world of business; if the desire for definite service of the purpose of God seizes an increasing number of men, it is because, in the words of Lord Acton, "The entrance of Christ into human history fails not, but increases." More than mystic skill to forecast His future comings we need plain Christian insight to discern the Christ who has come and is coming. Never does He come, indeed, except to insight; He has never yet revealed Himself except to the seeing eye—and that not because He will not, but because He cannot. In the old days of the visible presence He walked among men and they saw Him not. There were those who heard His voice and said: "He hath a devil." There were those who looked up into His very face and said: "We know this man whence He is, but when Christ cometh no man knoweth whence He is." We know these movements in history, whence they are, we say—they are the result of such and such historical forces—the fusion of Jewish and Greek thought—the renaissance and the growth of the national spirit—but when Christ cometh it will be outside history. And all the while out of the midst of them there looks the face of Christ.

Surely it is in the lessons of the past that we find the best key to the future. It is in what Christ has done and is doing that we find the clue to what Christ will do. And the Christian faith for the future is just the faith that Christ will come with more power and greater glory as the years go by. That is the essence of the Christian hope for the earth, and that is all of its essence. The precise form of His future comings we do not know, and that matters little. But we are certain that any real progress in the world must come through the increase of the personal influence of Christ and the growth of the spirit of Christ in human life.

This does not mean, of course, that the element of crisis is to be left out of our thought of the future. Slow change is apt, indeed, to result finally in sudden change. The waters gather and at last the dam breaks. Crisis is, indeed, a form of growth, and this is the truth which is expressed in much of the language of the Bible. There were wars and rumors of wars when, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, the democratic movement swept over Western Europe, and men's hearts were failing them for fear of the things that were coming upon the earth. But as we look back we see on the rolling clouds of revolution the Son of Man coming to make men free with a larger liberty. Our own generation, too, has seen distress of nations and perplexity and tribulation such as hath not been since the foundation of the world. It has seen the exodus of entire populations from the land of their birth, driven before the marching armies as driftwood before the onrush of a flood. And again, as in old time, they that were in Judea fled to the mountains, and they that were in the city of Louvain halted not to take anything out of the house. And again men of vision, looking up out of the horror of Flanders and Lorraine, have seen on the heavens the sign of One whose sword is in His hand, who goes conquering and to conquer—to conquer, if by the bitter road of war men learn the desperate need and necessity of human brotherhood. So the language of the Bible shadows forth things that are true not once or twice, but again and again. And so, again and again, that which seems the crucifixion of the Spirit of Christ in its resurrection, and Christ comes to die that He may rise with new power from the dead.

But whether through growth or crisis the goal of earthly history and of Christian work remains the same. It is the making of the kingdom of Christ—it is the Christianization of the world. It is that Christ shall come, until His personality dominates the world and His principles control human life, private and public, national and international. That is the victory of the Christ, whose purposes we serve, and that is the only victory that can possibly satisfy him or meet the needs of the world. It must be a victory not of force over force, but of divine goodness and power over human sin and rebellion. Otherwise it is only disguised defeat. For God sent not His Son into the world to destroy the world, but that the world through Him might be saved. The outward kingdom of Christ can come, indeed, only with the coming of the inward kingdom—the empire of Christ is an inward empire over hearts and minds. And of that inward empire Christian people are the servants and the soldiers. It is our business to widen its frontiers and to deepen its authority. Ministers and stewards of His mysteriees are we, whose task it is to prepare and make ready His way by turning the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just. Whatever other worlds may have in store, our great earthly task is to help Christ in making this a Christian world. And that is a perfectly practicable goal. For the Spirit of Christ may be made the ruling spirit in human life; the spirit of service may replace the spirit of selfishness as the controlling spirit—the power of evil may be broken—deliberate evil may at least become sporadic like pestilence, and like pestilence capable of being isolated and controlled. The mass of mankind may become followers of Christ, and seek under His leadership to do the will of their Father which is in heaven. This world may be won for God and turned into one of His good stars.

These are large dreams, do we say? Nay, they are living faiths and they are practicable faiths. They are things worth working for—worth living for—worth dying for. Indeed, they are the only things worth living for. In these Advent faiths the Church has fought all her great battles—in these faiths all forward-looking souls have lived and worked and died. They have worked for that victory of God which is the making of man. The great battle cry of the Church in all ages has been: "Now it is high time that we awake out of sleep—the Lord is at hand!" And it has always been true. No generation, indeed, has ever passed but that there were some who saw the Lord come in His glory. And it is this spirit that rings today through all our Advent lessons, hymns and prayers. The night is far spent; the day is at hand. Let us therefore cast away the works of darkness and put upon us the armor of light. And that is the result to which all our thought of Advent should bring us. It is a call to the service of the kingdom of God so that Christ may come to each of us and to all of us more completely in the year that lies ahead.

Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

New Architects for Washington Cathedral.

The Board of Trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Foundation, of which the Bishop of Washington is president, has announced the selection of new architects for the Washington Cathedral, at the same time stating that it is hoped to resume building in the early spring and to continue without interruption until the Cathedral is completed. Whether this can be done, however, will depend upon how liberally contributions are made to the building fund.

At present the Cathedral is one-fourteenth finished, being the Bethlehem Chapel and the eastern end, which are visible from the city. When finished the Cathedral will cost approximately $10,000,000, or one-fourth the cost of a modern battleship, and there is now only about $800,000 in hand for the work. Unless funds continue to be received it will be possible to finish only the remainder of the foundations and portions of the choir. However, there is still being founded throughout the country the National Cathedral Association, which hopes for a membership of 100,000 annual contributors.

The Board has announced the selection of Frohman, Robb & Little, architects of Boston, to complete the work, while Cram & Ferguson, also of Boston, have been retained as consulting architects. In making the announcement of the selection of the architects, it is stated by the Board that Frohman, Robb & Little are the most skilled in gothic construction of any of the younger architects, while Cram & Ferguson are leaders in gothic construction among the older architects, and are the architects who designed the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City.

The Brotherhood Corporate Communion.

Reports reaching the National Office of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew from many parishes and missions from all parts of the United States indicate that there was a very splendid response to the suggestion made this fall for the holding of a Corporate Communion on the morning of the First Sunday in Advent. Notwithstanding the fact that in many parts of the country the day was stormy, a great many rectors have written that the effort which they put forth to reach their confirmed men and boys for the service that day was more than worth while.

The Church Club and the Ministry.

The Church Club is having a series of conferences on the subject of young men and the ministry, the leader being Dean Fosbroke, of the General Seminary. They are held on Saturdays at 4, and attended by from fifteen to thirty men. Previous to the present course talks were had on men's clubs, their work and their methods. The president of St. Thomas' Men's Association, General Avery D. Andrews, led the discussions. Immediately after the first of the year some conferences are to be had on mosaics for Church uses.

Fiftieth Anniversary of St. Ignatius' Parish Observed.

St. Ignatius' Parish, the Rev. William Pitt McCune, rector, celebrated during the first week in Advent the fiftieth anniversary of its founding, and it made the celebration a week of prayer, of communions with worthy intents, and with private prayer on the part of most of its communicants. Announcement was made during the observance that the number of communions made in the parish have increased 20 per cent. within the year. That was reckoned to be the basis for rejoicing, and the chief feature of the anniversary. The preachers on the opening Sunday were Bishop Weller, of Fond du Lac, and the Rev. Dr. Barry, of St. Mary the Virgin Parish, and on the second Sunday the rector in the morning and Bishop Manning in the afternoon. For December 4 the Rev. Dr. McClenthen, of Baltimore, was to have preached, but was prevented by illness.

St. Ignatius' Parish now occupies a splendid property, very complete, on the West Side, but it began fifty years ago in a small way in Seventh Avenue. Its first rector was the Rev. Ferdinand C. Ewer, who resigned the rectorship of Christ Church in order to found it. Only three rectors have followed, including the present one. The two others were the Rev. Dr. Arthur Ritchie, rector for many years, and the Rev. Maxwell Ganter. The second edifice occupied was in Fortieth Street, a one time Dutch Reformed Church. The present edifice dates from 1902. A window in memory of Robert A. McKim was unveiled by the Bishop of Fond du Lac.

In St. Barnabas' House there has just been unveiled a tablet in memory of Deaconess Susan P. Mather, who served as head of the house for twenty-five years. Bishop Lloyd placed on the altar $10,316 toward a fund of $25,000, the income of which is to care for babies at what is called St. Barnabas' Shelter. Mrs. Lincoln Cromwell is head of the Mather Memorial Committee.

The City Mission Society has entered upon work for the Chinese. In a chapel at the Cathedral a service in mandarin is held monthly for official classes of Chinese, but the new service is in Cantonese. In charge of it is the Rev. Thomas J. Williams, once in charge of similar work in San Francisco. A room in Chinatown has been secured. There are 10,000 Chinese in New York who speak the Cantonese dialect.

St. Cyrian's Chapel and Settlement, on the Manhattan West Side, the Rev. James W. Johnson in charge, has been renovated and improved at a cost of $17,000. A Working Girls' Home has been founded, with rooms for twelve, and an auditorium seating four hundred. A feature of the work is a laundry which gives employment to many. Three houses that were to have been torn down, and a chapel built, have been transformed into one of the most complete plants for settlement work of any colored congregation in the country. The work has always been prosperous under Mr. Johnson.

The Chapel of the Messiah, the Rev. M. Norman Wilson in charge, beginning in 1916 with only twenty-four members, has now four hundred. It was formerly for East Side white people. A need now is for a Community House. Miss Agnes Mason, who has had long training and experience, begins in December as head of Social Welfare work.

Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Cornerstone of Parish Hall Placed.

On November 19 Bishop Lines placed the cornerstone of the new parish hall at Clifton, which is to cost $23,000. It stands beside the Church, which will in due time be enlarged by the use of the present parish hall. It is a large undertaking under the Rev. John G. Martin, for a church which, within a few years, as a mission, was receiving diocesan aid. On Sunday, the 20th, the Bishop preached at the service, marking the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the work, under the fostering care at first of the Rev. William T. Evans, then rector of St .Mark's Church, Paterson, who was able to be present and to preach at one of the anniversary services.

Three Parishes Observe Anniversaries.

On Advent Sunday the tenth anniversary of the use of the present St. Mark's Church, Newark, was held. The Rev. A. W. H. Thompson is the rector and the sermon was preached by Bishop Lines. This parish has greatly prospered, having had its beginning with aid from the Diocesan Church Extension Fund, and now, having obtained in the Nation-Wide Campaign, just made, some ten or twelve thousand dollars, and having bought recently the large house beside the church for parish purposes and the future extension of the church. The parish now has more than two hundred families and five hundred communicants. At a parish reception on November 29, $800 were presented by the parishioners to the rector.

The fifteenth anniversary of St. Stephen's, Jersey City, was held at the beginning of Advent. This church, which was originally a mission from St. John's Church, has now a communicant list of four hundred and sixteen, with three hundred Sunday school members. Bishop Stearly preached the sermon. The rector is Rev. A. R. McWilliams.

The Parish of Holy Cross, Paterson, the Rev. James A. McCleary, celebrated its fifty-fifth anniversary on November 10, bringing together a large attendance of present and former parishioners.

Rt. Rev. H. R. Hulse, D. D., Bishop.

Dedication of a New School in Guantanamo.

On November 13 Bishop Hulse made a visitation of All Saints' Mission, Guantanamo. Although the church building is fairly large, it could accommodate less than half of the Jamaicans assembled for the service. This work is under the temporary charge of the Rev. S. B. Harris, a deacon and also a physician, the Ven. William Watson, who was formerly in charge and was the Archdeacon of Oriente Province, having recently accepted duty in Mexico.

On Monday, the 14th, the new school building recently erected on the rear of the lot on which the church stands was dedicated by the Bishop. Its cost thus far has been about $23,000, of which sum $5,000 was appropriated from the offering of the women at the last General Convention, the balance being special gifts for the purpose. Only a portion of the building has been erected. It is proposed to build an addition to it by which its capacity will be doubled. As it now stands, the building is filled to its fullest capacity. Miss Sarah Ashurst is in charge of this work, with four assistant teachers.

The Bishop also visited the naval station situated on the United States reservation on Guantanamo Bay, where a clergyman of our Church will soon be stationed as chaplain.

Tragic Death of Clergyman's Daughter.

The Rev. S. B. Harris, of Guantanamo, with his little daughter of twelve years, and four teachers from the Church school in Guantanamo, recently went for a picnic on the banks of a small river, and in the course of the day they all went in bathing. They were unfamiliar with the stream, there was a strong current, and the little girl was drawn out beyond her depth. First one and then another of the party undertook to save her, until they were all at the point of drowning, when at the last moment a Haytian passing by saw them struggling in the water, went to their rescue and succeeded in saving all but the little girl. Her body was finally brought to the shore, and although every effort possible was made to resuscitate her, it was useless. This sad affair has cast a dark shadow over the whole community, by whom the little child was greatly beloved.

Large Confirmations in Camaguey.

On his way home from a visitation of Guantanamo, Bishop Hulse recently made a special visit to old Camaguey, confirming in the mission of San Pablo a class of thirteen. The minister in charge of this work is the Rev. Juan McCarthy, who was recently transferred to this place from La Gloria, in the same province. He has three congregations, one of Spanish-speaking people, one of English-speaking whites, and one of Jamaicans. He has also a Sunday school with more than one hundred pupils.

Successful Mission at Salem: St. Andrew's Day Impressively Observed.

A very successful mission was held from Sunday night, November 13, to Friday night, November 18, at St. Paul's Church, Salem, the Rev. Thomas G. Faulkner, rector. The services, which were conducted by Rev. Claudius F. Smith, Diocesan Missioner, were well attended, not only by the members of the parish, but by a goodly number of outsiders. The sermons were of a popular and instructive nature and made a deep impression, especially upon the men of the congregation. In addition to services in the church every night, Mr. Smith spoke to the young women of Elizabeth College, the students of Roanoke College, the patients at Mount Regis Sanatorium, the children of the Salem schools, and to the members of the Kiwanis Club at its weekly dinner. The members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew took a great deal of interest in the mission, and hope in the near future to have Mr. Smith return for a longer period.

St. Andrew's Day was appropriately observed by the St. Paul's Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. At 7 A. M. all the members of the Chapter, except three, who were not able to be present, received the Holy Communion in a body. At 6:30 P. M. the Chapter entertained about fifty men at a supper which was beautifully served by the ladies of the parish. Among the guests were the rectors of St. John's, Roanoke, and St. Paul's, Salem, Dr. Charles J. Smith, president of Roanoke College, a large number of the members of the Brotherhood from St. John's Chapter, Roanoke, and the members of the male chorus, who participated in the service in the church at 8 P. M. A large congregation, the majority being men, attended this service, as the Brotherhood had sent out two hundred and fifty invitations to the men of Salem. The service was informal, and was conducted by the rector of the parish. Music was rendered by a male chorus, composed of some of the best voices of Salem and Roanoke. The Rev. Karl M. Block, rector of St. John's, Roanoke, made an address on "Ingratitude," basing his talk on the healing of the ten lepers. Altogether, this was one of the most impressive services ever held in Salem, and the members of St. Paul's Chapter of the Brotherhood are to be congratulated on the success which crowned their efforts.

Dr. Stetson Given Farewell Dinner.

The Rev. Dr. C. R. Stetson, rector of St. Mark's Church, Washington, who has accepted the call to become rector of Trinity Church, New York, expects to leave about December 20. The Men's Club of the church gave a dinner and reception in honor of Dr. and Mrs. Stetson on Thursday, December 8, in the parish hall. There was a program of music at the time of the reception, and some of the dinner speakers were Bishop Harding, Canon W. L. DeVries, Henry G. Blair and Major Charles R. Luce.

The Rev. J. S. Moses Accepts Call to Georgetown.

The new rector of St. John's Church, Georgetown, to succeed the Rev. Christopher Sparling, will be the Rev. John S. Moses, from Boston, Mass. The Rev. Mr. Moses has been first assistant to Dr. Mann, of Trinity Church, Boston, for two years. He is a graduate of Trinity College and a native of Garden City, L. I. His father was the dean of the Cathedral there. Mr. Moses will assume charge of his new duties at St. John's Church about the middle of January.

The Girls' Friendly Society of Epiphany Church celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its organization with special exercises at the evening service at Epiphany on Sunday, December 4. The address was made by Dr. Freeman. On Monday evening, December 5, a banquet and reception was held in the parish hall to further celebrate the event, and there were several speakers.

Services at the Church of the Ascension.

The Rev. W. H. Mayers, of the Diocese of Virginia, was the preacher at the Church of the Ascension on Sunday, December 4. It is planned to have outside clergy preach the sermons at the church until a rector is chosen to fill the present vacancy. The Laymen's League has launched a campaign to raise funds to put the finances on a sound basis, and a rally in the interest of such a campaign was held on Friday evening, December 2, under the charge of the Rev. D. Wellington Curran, who is temporarily in charge of the parish.

The Rectors' Aid Society of St. Paul's Church, near Washington Circle, has recently had the entire interior of the church beautifully decorated.

Prominent Laymen Address St. Andrew's Society of Philadelphia.

St. Andrew's Day was celebrated by the one hundred and seventy-second annual dinner of the St. Andrew's Society of Philadelphia at the Bellevue-Stratford.

Sir Auckland Geddes, the British Ambassador, was a guest of honor and the principal speaker of the evening. Other addresses were made by Governor Sproul, Job E. Hedges, of New York, and the Rev. Hugh Black, also of New York.

The St. Andrew's Society was organized in 1749, and is one of the oldest benevolent organizations in this country. Four signers of the Declaration of Independence were among its former officers, and its roll includes some of the most prominent men in Philadelphia.

Church of the Messiah Celebrates Diamond Jubilee.

Many former parishioners gathered in the Church of the Messiah, Port Richmond, Sunday, November 27, to take part in exercises which marked the diamond jubilee of the church. For many years the Messiah was the only church of the denomination in the district, which for a long while was a suburb, and an "industrial center on the Delaware shore," quite a distance from the city proper with its own local institutions. The parish was organized under the direction of the Rev. John Gordon Mazwell and soon had a large following among the "Scotch-Irish," who seventy-five years ago settled in large numbers in the Richmond district.

The present rector, the Rev. C. L. Fulforth, took charge in 1890, and has restored the church as a religious center, with a large membership.

The guests of honor at the services were Mrs. Samuel Humes and Henry B. Rutherford, the only two remaining of the congregation at the time of its organization.

On Wednesday evening there was a mass meeting of the parish, and several members of the clergy made addresses.

A fine carved oak pulpit in St. Clement's Church, Philadelphia, has just been completed and installed. This pulpit, placed in memory of George Henry Lea, by his widow, was never seen by Mrs. Lea, who died a few weeks ago. The pulpit is part of the remodeling of the interior of the church, which has been going on for several years. The interior is to be wainscoted with gray stone, and a series of new stained-glass windows installed. The Rev. Dr. Franklin Joiner is the rector.

Mrs. Gertrude Rozzell Fulton died December 1 at her home in Bryn Mawr. She was seventy-seven years of age. She was the widow of the Rev. Dr. John Fulton, formerly editor of the Church Standard and professor in the Philadelphia Divinity School, who died in 1907. The funeral was held on Friday.

MARYLAND

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Maryland Church Club Has Enthusiastic Meeting.

The fall meeting of the Churchman's Club of Maryland was held with banquet at the Baltimore Country Club, Thursday, December 1. The club now numbers six hundred and twenty-one members, and is aiming for a thousand. The club exists for social and inspirational purposes.

The pent up power of six hundred laymen in a diocese, set free to express the principles of Christ in the problems of the world and the Church, and that power multiplied throughout all our dioceses, represents a force that no pessimism could gainsay.

Mr. Joseph Forney Johnson, counsel for the Southern Railroad and son of ex-Senator Johnson, of Alabama, declared that modern industry without radical changes in the whole outlook and conception of life could not cope with the economic and international problems of the new age in which we are living. On the other hand, he was not prepared to go the full length of Mr. H. G. Wells in looking for a complete revolution. Without using the word, it was evident that Mr. Johnson considered the greatest foe to reasonable and righteous progress to be vicious propaganda, especially through the press. He would like to revive a medieval practice, but instead of burning heretics would apply the fagots to any editor who wantonly or through criminal carelessness misrepresented facts and truth. The only hope for popular government, now spread throughout the world, is true presentation of all the facts. Average intelligence may then be trusted for majority conclusions.

Mr. Henry F. Baker, chairman of the Committee on Unemployment, said that a carefully revised estimate of the number of unemployed, willing to work in Baltimore, was 8,000. He urged such community co-operation that would prevent bread lines and soup kitchens.

The club gave its cordial greeting to the new Bishop, of one of Maryland's daughter dioceses, Bishop Davenport, of Easton. Bishop Davenport was ordained deacon and priest in Baltimore by Bishop Paret. In a speech ful of fervor and feeling, Bishop Davenport said that just as there was unity of purpose and sinking of minor differences and prejudices during the war, so today we must look for a great cause which shall enlist enthusiasm and the energies of people. This cause, the great moral equivalent for war, is the Kingdom of God the recurrent theme of Christ's preaching.

In addition to greeting, a note of farewell was also sounded. After five years' residence in Maryland, Canon McComb returns to Massachusetts on January 1 to assume his new duties at the Cambridge Theological School.

Canon McComb presented two observations as result of his five years' sojourn in Baltimore, and three reflections on present day needs in the Church.

First, he was struck by the position and power of the laity. He would reverse the apothegm "like priest, like people," and would approve, "like people, like priest."

Second, he realized the strategic position of the Church in Baltimore at the border of the north and south.

The Church here should be open-minded for all new currents of thought that are passing from one position of the country to another.

Three present day needs of the Church were borne in upon him.

First, the revival of distinctly spiritual and religious preaching. We are suffering from a reaction of the dogmatic. The old dry dogmatic is not needed or desired, but fundamental doctrine bathed in a personal spiritual experience.

The second need is the enlargement of the individualistic gospel into a gospel of world constructive power.

The third reflection was caused by a question which forced itself. Is the Church functioning to bring in the Kingdom of God in America? The facts compel a negative answer. Sixty-two per cent. of our American population decline to acknowledge affiliation with church or synagogue. The Church failed to prevent the war. A divided Church will continue to fail. Only a united church can realize its full responsibility by being the servant of the world.

Bishop Murray closed by urging all to be optimistic in word and act, and to translate into life the messages of the evening.

The Nation-Wide Campaign.

The reports of the financial pledges of the Nation-Wide Campaign of the Diocese are still coming in very slowly, the rainy weather on the successive Sundays having delayed the work very seriously, eespecially in the rural parishes. The rectors of all parishes in the Diocese are prged to send their reports of financial pledges to the Treasurer of the Diocese at the earliest possible moment. Such reports as have come in are most encouraging as indicating that all over the Diocese the most earnest efforts are being made to reach the quotas assigned to the various parishes.

Successful Mission in Greene County.

The Rev. Luther B. Franck, rector of Westover Parish, conducted a most successful two weeks' mission in this Mountain Missionary district. Many old acquaintances readily recalled their former friend who nearly twenty years ago began his ministry in this part of his native State. His enthusiasm was a great inspiration to all and will have a lasting effect upon the large number of people who traveled many miles over rough mountain roads to hear him. His visit was a great blessing to the large field, which is ministered to by the Rev. Robert W. Lewis, of Mission Home.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew Hold Annual Service.

An inspiring sight was witnessed on St. Andrew's night when over two hundred Brotherhood men and boys took their annual Corporate Communion at St. Andrew's Church, Richmond. Instead of the regular choir, the members of the local senior and junior chapters, supplemented by the men's Bible class, led by Mr. J. P. Dashiell and Mr. R. E. Harton, filled the choir stalls.

A Brotherhood sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Geiger Irwin, who covered the fundamental principles of personal work. He brought out particularly the Church's duty to win the man and the boy. The Rev. J. Francis Ribble, D. D., rector of St. Andrew's, celebrated the communion, assisted by Mr. Irwin.

Upper Truro Parish: The Rev. Alexander Galt, on October 1, took charge of St. Timothy's, Herndon, and Christ Church, Chantilly, Upper Truro, in October, and has taken up with quiet earnestness the various activities begun by the Rev. W. C. Torrence, as well as developing others equally valuable. A reception under the auspices of the Woman's Guild welcomed the new rector and family to the town and parish. The vestry has had installed in the rectory the Arcola heating system, adding to the comfort of the home and to the value of the property.

The Sunday school work at both points has received new impetus from the zeal and interest of the rector and family, the Woman's Auxiliary, the choir, and St. Andrew's Brotherhood are strengthened by their aid; and the Business Men's Bible class, planned and presided over by Mr. E. B. Hutchison, and meeting every Sunday evening in St. Timothy's, is creating great interest among the business men of theot wn.

The Rev. Giles B. Palmer, formerly rector of Meade Meomrial Church, White Post, has entered upon his duties as rector of St. Stephen's Church, Westhampton, Richmond, holding his first service on Sunday, December 4.

The Rev. J. H. Gibboney, the rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Richmond, has been ill and incapacitated fro work during the past three weeks. He is now reported to be convalescent and hopes to be able soon to enter again upon his work.

Personal Notes

The business address of the Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop of Georgia, has been changed from 2425 Bull Street to Christ Church, Savannah.

The Rev. Croswell McBee, for eighteen years rector of the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Lansdowne, Pa., has accepted the call to the rectorship of old St. David's Church at Radnor, Pa. Mr. McBee has had the call under consideration several weeks. He will succeed the late Rev. Dr. William C. Rodgers and will take charge January 1.

Communications for the Secretary of the Diocese of Georgia will please be sent hereafter to the Rev. James B. Lawrence, Americus, Ga., in place of the Rev. S. J. French, resigned.

The Rev. W. A. Jonnard, rector of St. John's Church, Johnson City, Tenn., has been called as assistant rector of St. John's Church, Savannah, Ga.. and it is expected that he will accept the call. The Rev. W. T. Collect for Third Sunday in Advent.

O Lord Jesus Christ, Who at Thy first coming didst send Thy messenger to prepare Thy way before Thee; Grant that the ministers and stewards of Thy mysteries may likewise so prepare and make ready Thy way, by turning the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, that at Thy second coming to judge the world we may be found an acceptable people in Thy sight, who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Spirit ever, one God, world without end. Amen.

Old Hands.

Old hands are not for kisses
  Nor the gifts of long ago;
But old hands in a garden
  Can make the flowers grow.
We look at them in wonder
  One day and, sighing, see
Them changed and old and withered—
  Surprised that this should be.
Such smooth, soft hands they once were,
  Pink tipped, pink palmed and now,
So thin—or plump—and wrinkled,
  But useful anyhow!
"Your hands are like two roses,"
  Our husbands used to say,
Well, now one needn't work in gloves
  In gardens anyway!
The flowers don't see the difference;
  They only feel a touch
Of tender understanding
  And blossom twice as much.
Old hands can hold a baby
  And smooth a pillow too;
Old hands can write a letter
  Signed "Grandma's love to you."
Old hands return the prussure
  Of strong, big hands of sons,
Of grandsons and granddaughters—
  The loving little ones.
So old hands do God's bidding
  In gardens and highways,
And at evening in contentment
  Old hands are clasped in praise.

Christ Walks Upon the Sea.

Matt. 14:24-33; Mark 6:47-52; John 6:16-21.

The Rev. Louis Tucker.

When Jesus multiplied the loaves and fishes it was Passover time. The people themselves had seen the parallel to the manna, thought of the wanderings in the wilderness, spoken of the Promised Land and the Kingdom of God. The broken bread, the supper, the popular attempt to make Him King must have suggested to Him that other broken bread, the last supper and the cry, "We have no king but Caesar." He went into the pasture lands alone. We do not know of what He prayed, but can guess.

The people in the boat were in great discomfort and some danger. The boat had more than twelve on board, was overloaded, and pulled heavily. When at our Lord's command they put out into the lake, a "great wind" "contrary to them" was rising. It seems to have been a clear wind, with no rain. All but the very last of the night was moonlight. It drew to the fourth and last watch, towards dawn. The boat was less than two-thirds across the lake, which is here six miles wide. One who has helped pull a heavy boat in the teeth of a great wind will understand. They had double-banked the oars, of course. It was the obvious thing to do. They had pulled for eight hours with double-banked oars, into the wind's eye, and had made less than four miles. They were still pulling. It was possible to run for shelter to a dozen coves. But He had given them orders—short, sharp, incisive orders—for the first time in their lives. He had told them to go to Bethsaida, right in the wind's eye, and to Bethsaida they would go, if it took all night and broke their hearts.

The position of the moon depends on the number of days before Passover and on the time of night, both of which are approximately known. It was probably very big and low in the west, ballooning over the hills, so that all the waves before them were black dark except for the central moon-glade, and all behind them were ablaze with moon-silver. The rowers, facing east, saw a glimmer of white far behind them, which rose and fell with the waves and rapidly overhauled them. Men who have watched an unknown obect over water will know the stages of doubt and wonder they went through. At last there was no doubt. It was a man, walking quietly, as a man might walk on land.

There is a great and grave difference between the psychology of sailors and landsmen; a difference which only sailors understand. Landsmen call sailors "superstitious," which is a shallow explanation of a point of view. A landsman, especially a city man, refuses to believe the impossible and the refusal is just. Experience has shown that there is usually some imposture, and the thing has not really occurred.

Men who live much on the water have no such prejudice. Long and bitter experience has shown them that impossible things happen. Any one who has examined wreckage after a storm or seen what a boat will do in stress of weather understands Nelson's remark that all things are possible at sea, and finds the mental division between possible and impossible practically obliterated. The question is never whether a thing is possible, but merely whether it is seen plainly; and this attitude is just and is founded upon observation. Life on the water trains men to accept present facts irrespective of previous prepossessions. Perhaps this is why boatmen were chosen as apostles.

The fishermen in the boat accepted what they saw. The man was coming up as if to pass them. As no living man can walk on water, it must be the spirit of a dead man. They had left the Master preparing to quell an armed mob. A deadly fear settled upon them. The mob must have killed Him.

All this happened slowly. There was time to think. At last they could make out features in the moonlight. It was He. Some one said so, and all their vast plans vanished. The tense string of their anguish snapped, and they cried out like men in a nightmare for fear. It was a foretaste of the day after the crucifixion.

Then He spoke, and His words shook them by their simplicity. He said:

"Be of good cheer. It is I. Be not afraid."

So He was alive, and not dead and a ghost. They could not take in the fact. Then the captain of the boat, Simon Stone, exalted beyond himself, had a quick flash of perception. If one living man could stand on the water, another might. He said:

"Lord, if it be Thou, bid me come to Thee upon the water."

"Come."

And when he was come down out of the boat—he vaulted over the gunwale—he walked on the water to go to Jesus. But when he saw the wind boisterous, he was afraid, and, beginning to sink, he cried, "Lord, save me." And immediately Jesus stretched out His hand and caught him and said, "Oh thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?"

The boat drifted down upon them, the Master helped Simon Stone into it and stepped in himself, and suddenly the wind stopped.

Levi-Matthew says, "Those that were in the ship" worshipped, saying, "Of a truth thou art the Son of God." Mark says the apostles were sore amazed, beyond measure, and wondered; for they considered not the miracle of the loaves; for their hearts were hardened. They probably began rowing again, mechanically, while old Zebedee and the boy and any other passengers came carefully, one by one (for the waves tossed them), and knelt at Jesus' feet. Captain Simon was at the helm, but he must have watched the worship and steered unknowingly. Any one, if astonished beyond measure, naturally would. Then, when the worship was over, they suddenly realized where they were, for John says: "And immediately the ship was at the land whither they went."

The mental attitude which made them accept facts quickly made them slow to draw deductions, especially when wearied to the point of stupefaction by eight hours of gasping toil. It was some one not an apostle into whose mind flashed a sudden realization of the meaning of all the sayings and of the long, slow preparation, and who first of living men saw Christ as we know Him, Jesus as we see Him, and worshipped our Lord Jesus Christ. the Son of God.

And then the day dawned.

THE METAMORPHOSED JONES FAMILY.

How the Tuberculosis Nurse Brought Health Into a Home.

Elizabeth Cole.

Mrs. Jones called out the kitchen door: "Din-ner: Come to din-ner."

Four little Joneses, aged three to ten, and two orphan cousins, Smith, dashed noisily into the room and took their seats about the table in the kitchen. Do you think they bothered to wash their hands, faces, or clean their finger-nails? Most decidedly not. If they had we should not be writing this story. Food was ready; eating was in order; the sooner, the better.

"Cold corned beef today," said Mother Jones, dealing out a slice to each child. "Coffee instead o' tea, too. Tea's out."

The children picked up their slabs of meat in begrimed hands and bit off pieces. A long roll of French bread was passed from hand to hand and broken off. It gathered mixed germs and dirt on its rapid journey. The coffee contained sugar, but no milk. The meal was tossed off in eight or ten minutes. Then the Jones, plus Smith orphans, trooped out into the yard again, some to school and some to play.

Two days later Mrs. Jones, as before, announced from the kitchen door: "Din-ner. Come to din-ner." Three little Joneses, aged three to eight, and the two orphan cousins, Smith, as noisily as before, dashed into the room to their respective places about the table. As before, they washed neither hands, faces, nor cleaned finger-nails.

The story here changes.

"Where's Charley?" asked Mother Jones, dealing out some delicatessen potato salad and pouring out tea.

"Stayed after school," mumbled Susie, aged eight, with her mouth full of salad.

"Teacher give him a lickin'?" asked the parent.

"Naw, he wanted ter see a bowlful o' bugs the pretty new nures had," replied Susie.

"What nurse? Who's sick?" questioned Mrs. Jones.

"Nobody's sick. A new nurse came today and said a tuberculosis society sent her so's nobody'd get sick," replied the child. "She had a bowlful o' bugs 'n any who liked could stay after. I didn't want to look at the old things."

"Well, well, what nonsense—collectin' bugs. 'Sif you can't see enough o' bugs without stayin' after school." This last remark was addressed to the tardy Charley, who came excitedly into the scene.

"Stop!" he cried. "Don't eat another bite o' bugs." He began seizing the food from the hands of his astonished family. "All you folks gotter go wash yer hands. Gee, you don't know what I know."

"What's the matter with you, Charley? What notions have you been gettin'?" said his mother, attempting to lead him over to his chair.

"No, sir, yer don't catch me eatin' till I wash—not after what I saw." And he went over to the sink and performed his ablutions.

"What, in the land sakes, has bugs and food got to do?"

"Well, you dunno, do you? I'll tell you what, 'n I saw it, too. Nurse, she said she made a feller wash his hands in some warm water 'n some soap. I tell you he scrubbed, too, she said. 'N then she took the water he'd used 'n a doctor thinned it off or something, 'n d'yer know what he saw? He saw four million bugs, 'n she had 'em all there in the bowl." To Susie, "Now don't you wish you'd stayed?"

"Four million bugs—how could they get in one little bowl? She was kiddin' you," scornfully replied Susie.

"She was not. Nurse said his hands wasn't so dirty as mine, 'n she guessed I'd put about ten million in with my dinner. Bet Susie's got a pint a germs insider her."

Susie sat open-mouthed, gazing at her sadly soiled hands. The whole family, in fact, looked down at their own and each others.

"You got ter eat a peck o' dirt, anyway," said Mother Jones hopefully.

"Yeah, dirt's all right, but there's germs that get coughed out that give you tuberculosis. Saw a tuberculosis bug in the bowl. Nurse said you put it in yer mouth 'n you get the 'con.' She said supposin' yer next-door neighbor expect'rates on the sidewalk 'n you play marbles 'n pick it up 'n don't wash off yer hands before dinner. Yer may catch it off him."

"Old man Mulligan's got the 'con,'" said Mrs. Jones, ushering her family to the sink and soap.

"I saw him on the street," piped up Susie. "'N I was playin' marbles, too. Oh, dear, I don't want to get 'con.'" And Susie began to weep.

"Aw, now, don't you worry, Susie; you ain't got it, or you'd know it. But better watch out, though."

Susie wiped her tears away and began to scrub both hands and face until she became crimson with her efforts.

Charley continued, "He kin git arrested, if he coughs bugs out on the street. Nurse said so. Sure he kin use a cup or somethin'. I mean he can't shoot his bugs on the street where the children's likely ter grab 'em up. Jimmy! look at the dirt."

This last ejaculation was made upon discovering the blackness of the basin of water in which his family had all washed. "Did you all wash in the same water?" He addressed them all. "Oh, you poor fishes, doncher know you giv yerselves yer germs when you wash together? Nurse said ter use yer own water 'n towel 'n said ter get a tooth-brush. Ma, get me a tooth-brush?"

"Ma, get me one," echoed Susie.

"Ma, I want a tooth-brush," chorused the whole Jones family, plus Smith cousins.

And with them all clamoring eagerly for tooth-brushes, we will leave the story of the metamorphosed Jones family.

They will not be left by the tuberculosis health nurse, however, who had been really responsible for their cleaning up. She will go to their home and teach them all kinds of other habits of health and clean living. She will prevent them from "catching" Mr. Mulligan's tuberculosis.

And the reason she can do this is because you help support her in her educational work through buying and selling the Tuberculosis Health Seals at Christmas.

Long the Road.

Long the road
  Till Love came down it!
Dark the life
  Till Love did crown it!
Dark the life
  And long the road,
Till Love came
  To share the load!

For the touch
  Of Love transfigures
All the road
  And all its rigors.
Life and death
  Love's touch transfigures.
Life and death
  And all that lies
In between
  Love sanctifies.

Christmas.

Is it too soon to talk about Christmas? We think not. For, the best suggestions and recommendations as to the right keeping of Christmas by Christian people are apt to come too late—to come when all the arrangements have been made and cannot easily be changed.

So, we speak thus early, and say that the most important—really the only important—feature of Christmas-keeping is the church service.

All the home festivities, which are quite natural and proper in themselves, should be put at hours when they will not interfere with attendance at the services.

And all the bestowal of presents on relatives and friends should be so limited as not to prevent generous alms to the poor and generous gifts to the Church.

The dismal and dominant fact is that the world has laid hold on, appropriated, smirched and nearly ruined the great Christian festival.

And yet, how absurd is the ordinary worldly Christmas—a big dinner, a dance, a tree laden with articles for those already cursed with superfluity.

What has all this to do with Christmas Day? What connection has it with the event of Bethlehem?

No wonder that, as the years pass by, Christmas becomes a mockery and a bore to our average people. They barely tolerate it because of the children's joyance in its holiday observances. For themselves it has no savor or delight.

To think that it should come to this! To think that the anniversary of the birth of Jesus should not strike our minds and hearts with splendor! To think that Christmas should become to us only a wearisome social form.

Well, let the world do what it chooses with the twenty-fifth of December; but, at least, let us Christians observe with all high and holy rites the nativity of our Lord. For that is an observance which will never lose its lustre and its charm and its inspiration.—Palm Branch.

The Celestial City.

The city paved with gold,
  Bright with each dazzling gem!
When shall our eyes behold
  The new Jerusalem?
Yet lo! e'en now in viewless might
Uprise the walls of living light!

The kingdom of the Lord!
  It cometh not with show!
Nor thorn, nor crown, nor sword,
  Proclaim its might below.
Though dimly scanned through mists of sin,
The Lord's true kingdom is within.

The gates of pearl are there
  In penitential tears:
Bright as a jewel rare
  Each saintly grace appears:
We track the path saints trod of old,
And lo! the pavement is of gold!

The living waters flow
  That fainting souls may drink;
The mystic fruit-trees grow
  Along the river's brink.
We taste e'en now the water sweet,
And of the Tree of Life we eat.

Not homeless wanderers here
  Our exile songs we sing;
Thou art our home most dear.
  Thou city of our King!
Thy future bliss we cannot tell,
Content in Thee on earth we dwell.

Build, Lord, the mystic walls!
  Through wide and unseen gates!
Fill all the golden halls,
  While yet Thy triumph waits!
Make glad Thy Church with light and love,
Till glorified it shines above!

—W. Walsham How.

A scientist and a layman were watching a butterfly struggling to burst the threads of its cocoon, when the layman cut the strands and the butterfly came forth; but the scientist said, "You have robbed the butterfly of its wonderful colors, for beauty only comes through toil and effort." A life surrendered to God will not be spent in idleness.

For the Young Folks

When He Comes.

Christ will come to earth again;
He will come to dwell with men;
He will meet them in the mart;
He will greet them heart to heart;
He will make all hard things plain,
When He comes.

Christ will come again to earth;
Then shall be a new world-birth;
War and armaments shall cease;
Every land shall bide in peace;
Swords will be of little worth,
When He comes.

Christ will come, aye, He will come
Not with trumpet blare and drum;
But with lives of kindliness
All men shall His name confess;
There shall none be blind or dumb,
When He comes.

—Thomas Curtis Clark.

The Lady and the Merchant.

In the days when little Phoebe Bradley lived there were few trains and no automobiles, and so family reunions were not easy. But the summer when the town became a hundred years old there was a big celebration, and many people who had once lived in Paxton came back for a visit. The Bradley home was full of bustle and excitement, for no fewer than five aunts and cousins were coming there to stay.

Little Phoebe's cheeks were pink with pleasure. "Oh, I do hope there'll be some child cousins!" she cried.

"There will be your cousin Alexander Bates," her mother said. "He is an only child, Phoebe, and not at all strong. You must be very good to him."

"I will, mother," promised gentle little Phoebe.

The next afternoon, when the stagecoach stopped at the gate, Phoebe, in her tight-fitting little bodice and full stiff skirts, was waiting and ready. She went primly down the walk to welcome Alexander and then took him off to play.

The little curly-haired boy had quick, restless ways; he seemed to be everywhere at once. Phoebe found it hard to keep up with him.

The next day it rained; that was Tuesday, and all the visitors in Paxton were resting after their long journeys. All the housekeepers were specially busy, because Wednesday was to be the big day of the reunion, with speeches in the town hall and dinner on the green.

"Keep Alexander amused," Phoebe's mother told her, "so that his mother can sleep."

"Yes, mother, I will," said Phoebe.

She felt sorry for her mother, for on this most important day the cook had been called out of town, and there was no one to take her place except little fifteen-year-old Molly Ware, who lived in the village. Molly did not know much about cooking and was easily flustered.

All the morning, while the rain pattered on the windows, Phoebe and Alexander played together in the sitting-room. After dinner it still rained, and Alexander became a little restless. He wanted to go and play in the kitchen, but Phoebe shook her head, for at three o'clock Molly would come to make cakes and pies for the dinner on the green, and Alexander would be in the way.

"Let's play store instead," she suggested, "here on this table by the clock. You can be the storekeeper, and I'll come and buy things from you with paper money."

Alexander was much pleased. "All right," he said. "What shall I have in my store? It will be a grocery store, you know, like my father's."

But Phoebe thought a dry goods store would be much better. "There are no groceries for you to keep, you know," she told him. "Take the pins and spools and other things out of my work-basket and play that they are dry goods."

Then, as the little boy frowned, she added, "And I'll dress up like a grown lady to come shopping with my paper money."

She left Alexander gazing discontentedly at the work-basket and ran upstairs to get ready. After she had found some paper and had cut it into round pieces she went to find her mother and ask whether she might borrow some of her clothes for the game.

"Yes," said Mrs. Bradley. "Anything to keep that child quiet. His mother and the rest are trying to take a nap."

So Phoebe put on a dolman, as they called ladies' loose coats in those days, and a pair of long mittens. She dressed her hair high and caught it with a big comb. Then, feeling very fine in her grown-up clothes, she hurried back to the sitting-room.

"The store's all ready," Alexander called cheerfully. Then he added in loud, manlike tones, "What will you have today, Mrs. Jones? See my fine goods."

Phoebe stood still in the door and gazed. Alexander's "goods" were potatoes and fruit, flour, spices and other supplies. Not a half-hour before she had seen Molly set out those very things on the kitchen table all ready for use. Molly had gone on an errand, but she would return soon in a big hurry to begin the important preparations for tomorrow. Here was a fine state of affairs, thought Phoebe.

"What are you doing with these things, Alexander?" she asked the young storekeeper.

"Playing store with them," said Alexander promptly. "I ran out to the kitchen and got them while you were gone."

"Well, we must take them back," Phoebe said gently. "We can't play with those things, you know."

Alexander's face fell. "They are groceries to play store with," he said firmly.

Phoebe's heart sank to the toes of her little strapped slippers. She did not know what to do. If she opposed Alexander he might be noisy and wake the company from their naps, and yet there was Molly to think about and the cooking "O dear!" she said aloud.

Then she thought of something and was much relieved. The matter was simple enough, of course; she would buy the groceries with the paper money and then they would be hers, and she could take them back to Molly.

"Well, Mr. Grocer," she said, "please give me a sack of flour, a can of cherries and a quarter of a pound of cinnamon." She was thinking to herself, "If I can get that much back to Molly, she can begin on her cherry pies, and then I'll manage to get the rest afterwards."

Alexander pushed the goods forward with an important air. "Two dollars," he said.

Phoebe felt that she could not pay for her purchases quickly enough. Hurriedly pulling from her bag a handful of the paper money, she pushed it across the counter to Alexander and began to gather up the groceries.

"Wait," said Alexander. "Where is the money to pay for my groceries?"

Phoebe pointed to the round pieces of paper.

"That's nothing but paper," Alexander said scornfully. "Paper money is green, with pictures of men on it."

"O Alexander," said Phoebe, "real money is like that, but this is only play money, you know."

Alexander's mouth looked obstinate. "Are these play groceries?" he demanded.

The two children stood gazing at each other.

"O dear," Phoebe thought, "I believe I am going to lose my temper, and that will never do." She was strongly tempted to grab the stuff and run with it. But that would never do, either; such a fuss as would follow! She continued to stare at her cousin, and he stared back.

Suddenly Phoebe swept the paper pieces back into the bag and stamped her foot. "Give me those things," she said. "Molly is waiting for them this minute."

Alexander stamped, too. "Who is Molly?" he said. "You give me real money, and I'll give you these things! So now!"

He looked so little and absurd as he stood frowning behind his "counter" that Phoebe's heart softened.

"He's very young," she thought, "and they've spoiled him because he isn't strong. Besides, he hasn't the least idea how badly he's behaving."

Downstairs Molly opened the kitchen door. Poor Molly, she would be puzzled to death!

"Now, what shall I do?" Phoebe wondered.

"Mrs. Jones, you must give me real dollars for my real groceries," Alexander repeated. His chin trembled a little.

An idea popped into Phoebe's head. It was not a very agreeable idea, but still there it was in her head, and she could not get it out. Her own two precious dollar bills that she was saving to buy a doll with—of course she could take them and buy the groceries instead!

"But I don't want to," she thought miserably. "I couldn't make him give the money back to me, and it's all I have in the wide world!"

She tried to forget about her money, but she could not forget about the dinner for tomorrow or about poor, bewildered Molly down in the kitchen, and the company all taking naps.

"Mr. Grocer," said Phoebe suddenly, "hand me the groceries right quick, and I'll run and get some real money to pay for them with; I promise you I will."

Alexander was an accommodating business man. Without a word he handed over his whole stock.

Phoebe thankfully gathered it all up and ran, a queer little figure in the big flapping dolman, to the kitchen.

"Here, Molly," she said hastily; "here is your flour and the other things. I can't stop to tell you about it." Then she went racing up to her own room.

When she came back to the sitting-room she had a small brown pocketbook clasped in one hand; her eyes looked rather red. Silently she laid two bills in front of Alexander.

The little boy picked them up and pocketed them with a flourish. "Now it's your turn to keep store," he said. "What are you going to sell me out of that bag?"

"There's nothing in the bag but make-believe paper money," Phoebe answered sadly.

Alexander tiptoed to peep. "I like make-believe paper money," he remarked. "Here, stand behind the counter and put your goods out so that I can see them."

When the round pieces of paper were all spread on the table, Alexander reached into his pocket "How much is the lot worth?" he asked with a grand air.

Phoebe's heart gave a bound. "Two dollars," she said. To herself she added, "If he'll only decide to buy!"

Alexander threw the two bills down on the table and scooped up the paper money. "That's all this afternoon," he said, and walked grandly away.

Phoebe's face was happy as she stuffed the two bills into her bag. "O Alexander," she said, "let's not play store any more. Look, the rain is over, and the sun is coming out; let's go out in the back yard and play ball."

"All right," said Alexander. "I like ball betteer than store, don't you?"

Phoebe nodded. "Oh, ever so much better," she answered. She felt like singing. Molly had her groceries, and the company had had their naps, and she herself had her precious money back. My, how the sun did shine as they played ball in the back yard!—Nancy Byrd Turner, in Youth's Companion.

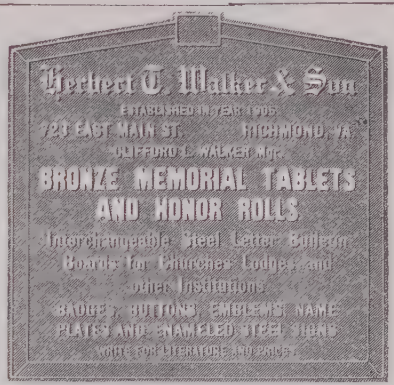
THE BROTHERHOOD OF ST. ANDREW IN THE UNITED STATES

An organization in the Church for the spread of Christ's Kingdom among men and boys by means of Personal Prayer and Personal Service.



Convinced that Chapters of the Brotherhood can only attain their maximum effectiveness by having a carefully laid out program covering at least a one-year period, the Brotherhood is suggesting the following minimum program as the basis of the Chapter's corporate work for 1922.

A Monthly Men's Corporate Communion.
Ushering and Hospitality at Church Door.
A Church Attendance Campaign during the year.
House-to-House Canvass to uncover additional opportunities for personal work.
Hotel-Boarding House Work.
Round Table Conferences or Periodic Bible Class.
Organize Junior Chapter if there be none in the Parish.
Arrange two visits to other Chapters or Churches to increase interest in the Brotherhood.
A Delegate to the National Convention.
Co-operate with the Nation-Wide Campaign.

Two or more men or boys, with the consent of the Rector, can organize a Chapter.

The Boy Who Did Not Want to Go to School.

"I won't go to school," the boy said. "I would very much rather stay at home and play," he decided. Then he kicked up his heels and felt very happy because he knew that he could keep on idling just as he had all the long, gold-colored vacation adys. And first of all, he called his dog Sport to come out and run down the lane with him.

"Come, Sport, good old Sport; we're off to play," called the boy.

Sport heard, but he did not come. He was hard at work burying bones in deep holes that he dug with his paws all around his kennel. "Woof, woof!" he barked. "I haven't time to play."

So the boy called his fat, sleek tabby cat, who was delighted indeed usually to take a walk with him. "Come, Tabby, dear old Tabby; we're going to play," called the boy.

Tabby was on her way to the green pasture where gray, skipping field mice played in the long, dry grasses. In a very respectful row behind Tabby walked her five kittens, their little tails stuck straight with pride and little pink feet going pit-a-pat in time to Tabby's purring. The five kittens were going to have their first lesson in mouse-catching. Mrs. Tabby was going to give the lesson.

"Purr, purr," sang Tabby. "I am quite too busy to play."

The boy decided then to ask some of his toys to play, and he went into the house and fetched out his red kite, that could fly as far as its string would let it. He unrolled the string and ran across the garden, calling to the wind: "Blow, wind. My kite and I are going to play."

But, ah! the wind had whisked away very, very early that morning to the orchard to help a farmer pick apples. Then the wind had journeyed on farther to the woods to begin spreading leaf patch-work quilts over the sleepy anemones and violets and Solomon's seal.

"Whoo-oo wants to play; you-oo?" whistled back the wind. "Whoo-oo but you-oo!" For the wind was too busy and too far away to help the boy's kite to fly.

"Very well, I will make thistle balls," thought the boy, putting away his kite. "That will be the most fun of all."

To find the tall, purple blossoms by the side of the yellow road, to cut them, to hang them on mother's clothes line until the white down puffed out and over and into a ball—It was the best-of-all fun to make thistle balls! The boy ran down the yellow road to the place where the purple thistles grew. There were none there. All the thistles had been working hard to make downy seeds, and all the downy seeds had blown away to plant themselves and make another summer's purple thistles.

"I can make myself a dandelion watch chain," the boy said, going back to the pasture where the dandelions had stood yesterday in an array of bobbing yellow and white heads. "It will have fifty links, and I will use one large yellow dandelion for the watch and another for the fob," the boy thought.

But, alas! the pasture was no longer full of dandelions. The mowers had cut the grass for the winter's hay. From a nearby field of yellow grass the boy could hear the mowers singing:

"Sow and reap the harvest today;
Work, don't shirk, and afterwards play."

"Who will play with me?" asked the boy, going home.

"I'm too busy," answered the grocer's boy, racing by with basket of crisp green vegetables and rosy fruit on his arm.

"After I finish my work I'll play with you," laughed the baker's boy as he hurried along with a tray of brown wheat loaves and little round cakes.

"I can't play now; I'm going to school," said the little pink gingham girl who lived next door. She wore a pink bow on her curls and a smile on her little pink face.

"I want to go to school," the boy decided, jumping off the gate and running into the house.

"Why, of course you do," agreed the boy's mother. And she put into his hands a beautiful surprise. It was a wooden pencil box painted orange. Inside were colored pencils and slate pencils and a red eraser and a shining pen and a pencil-sharpener. And the box had a lock and key.—Carolyn Sherwin Bailey, in the Delineator.

Hector and His Little Boy.

I am going to tell you a story from a very old book. It is older than much of our Bible. They tell us that it was written by a man whose name was Homer, but very little is known about him except that he was a great poet and that he was blind.

He tells a story about one of the great soldiers of his time whose name was Hector. He was starting out to one of the wars, for war in those days was the main business of life, and his wife and little boy came out to say good-bye. He was dressed in his heavy armour with his shining helmet flashing in the sun, and looked very strange and very dreadful, and when he put out his arms to take his boy and kiss him, the little fellow drew back to his mother and cried out for fear and fright. When the father understood. he took off his helmet and laid aside his shield, and then the little lad knew that it was his own dear father, and running from his mother, he sprang into his father's arms and kissed him again and again.

You know it is hard for us to think right thoughts about God. We say that God is great, that He is mighty, that He is a great Judge and a great King, and these great names frighten us and make us afraid. We think of the thunder and the lightning as His voice, but those things do not tell us the truth about God, and so He sent Jesus into the world. Jesus became a little child and grew up to be a man and lived His beautiful life among us, and said to those who wanted to see God: "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." It was Jesus who took little children in His arms and blessed them, and He it is who helps us to know God and to love Him. Let us say it over again, "God is Love."—Hugh T. Kerr, in Children's Story Sermons.

After Three Months.

The following letter was written by a little Armenian boy to his teacher after three months of instruction in English:

"My Dear Miss Marks.—On Friday, when we came to take our lesson, you were good enough to play on piano and sing with pretty well songs. We were glad our friend, Iscander, had brought his violin. He was expert to strike violin because he has learned it from his father. Almost it is his from nature. We surround you and Iscander and we listened pleasant resounds. Then you pleased to show to us different things which is called Puzzle. It has many pieces nice board. The whole picture, which was a little boy and his sister, whose were carrying to their grandfather beautiful and fragrant bunches of flowers. We travail a long time to build it, but we get unsuccessfulness. We prospered only to build it half. It was funny and wonderful.

"Good-bye now, your sincere pupil,
"SAMUTL EHERCHIAN."

Take time for prayer,
Be not too busy with thy work and care
To look to God, to clasp thy hand in His;
Miss thou all else, but fail thou not of this:
Thou needst not all alone thy burdens bear;
Listen and wait, and learn to do His will;
His love and service all thy life shall fill.

Poe: Entered into rest, at her home, 1204 North Charles Street, Baltimore, Md., in the eighty-second year of her age, ANNE JOHNSON POE, wife of the late John Prentiss Poe.

"The love of all thy sons encompass thee,
The love of all thy daughters cherish thee."

Simonds: Peacefully entered into rest at Berkeley, Cal., November 14, 1921, ANNA HILL, beloved wife of Rev. James Simonds, aged fifty-nine years. A faithful wife, mother and friend.

Doswell: At his home, Ashland, Va., November 21, 1921, T. BERNARD DOSWELL, only son of the late T. W. Doswell, of Bullfield, Hanover County, Va.

Goodwyn: On Tuesday, November 8, 1921, RICHARD T. GOODWYN, JR., age twenty-nine, only son of Richard T. and Sallie Aylett Goodwyn, while in discharge of his duty as Eighth District Engineer of the Georgia State Highway Department, was instantly killed in an automobile accident near Covington, Ga.

"I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

ERNEST MORRELLE GOODWYN.

Entered eternal life at his home in Norfolk, Va., on Thanksgiving morning, November 24, 1921, ERNEST MORELLE GOODWYN, eldest son of Eugenia Littlejohn (Feild) Goodwyn and the late Captain Junius A. Goodwyn. There still survive him his mother, three sisters and three brothers. He married early in life Miss Willie Hunter, who preceded him to the grave many years. He was of a sunny disposition and enjoyed life, but it was nipped in its prime. He was sick a long time and suffered a great deal, but he bore his sufferings with the greatest fortitude and patience, and a murmur never escaped his lips. Thus death claimed him as a shining mark.

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep."

RICHARD T. GOODWYN, JR.

RESOLUTIONS.

Adopted by the vestry of Emmanuel Church, Athens, Ga., on the occasion of the death of RICHARD T. GOODWYN, JR.

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God in His wise Providence, though inscrutable to us, to call from the ranks of the Church Militant on earth to the Church Expectant in Paradise, our honored and esteemed young brother, RICHARD T. GOODWYN, JR., son of Richard T. Goodwyn, Sr., respected and valued member of this vestry; therefore be it resolved:

First. That we, as a corporate body, and individually, mourn the loss, from our sensible presence, of so true and loyal a friend, of such a good citizen and efficient servant of the State, of a life so promising of wide and useful service, of such a devoted soldier of Jesus Christ—who never flinched nor shirked from any duty that came to him.

Second. That while we mourn this loss to our senses, we affirm our steadfast belief in the Communion of Saints, which assures the continuity of life and love and mutual helpfulness in the mystical Body of the one Christ in the service of the one God forevermore.

Third. That we express to Mr. Richard T. Goodwyn, Sr., our brother in the vestry, and to Mrs. Goodwyn and Miss Sallie Goodwyn, our sincerest sympathy in their sore bereavement, with the assurance that they have our prayers that the Almighty Father may comfort them with a sense of His goodness, lift up the light of His countenance upon them, and give them the peace of God that passeth all understanding.

Fourth. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Mr. Goodwyn and also be spread on the minutes of the vestry.

For the vestry,
THOS. H. NICKERSON,
CHAS. M. STRAHAN,
A. G. RICHARDS,
Committee.

RESOLUTIONS.

In that it hath pleased Almighty God in His infinite wisdom to remove from our midst our beloved friend and coworker in the Woman's Auxiliary of St. John's Chrch, Tappahannock, and forasmuch as her beautiful life of patient suffering was an inspiration, therefore be it resolved:

First. That in the death of ANN SUSANNA LEWIS the Auxiliary has lost a faithful and earnest member, which loss we deeply feel, and bow in humble resignation to His divine will, knowing that "He doeth all things well."

Second. That her humble, trustful and noble life will ever live fragrant in our memory, and that she has left for us an example we shall strive to emulate.

Third. That we extend to the family our deepest sympathy in their great sorrow and bereavement.

Fifth. That a copy of these resolutions be placed upon the records of our Auxiliary, a copy sent to the family, and a copy to the Southern Churchman for publication.

(Signed) EMMA C. LATANE,
KATE C. PHILLIPS,
EMILY M. SNEAD.

For the Southern Churchman.

At Rest.

Rev. John E. Shea.

Asleep in the bosom of God!
Ah, soul! would you know what it means?
Go seek where the saints ever trod,
Where, patient, the heart ever gleans.

Too cold are the ways of the world
For hearts that are weary and lone;
Like autumn-leaves riven and hurled,
They fall to the earth with a moan.

They moan, but their moan's never heard;
They sigh, but the sound passes on
Like plaints of the sea; not a word
Escapes, till at length they are gone.

Asleep in the bosom of God!
What joy for the souls of the blest?
On thorny ways upward they plod,
Till gained is the place of their quest.

Asleep in the bosom of God!
Ah, no! not asleep, but at rest:
Redeemed by the life-giving rod,
The mark of His blood on their breast.

400,000 VOICES IN UNISON

What a wonderful inspiration it would be if we could hear, at one time, the congregations in all the churches throughout the country now using the New Hymnal singing one of our stirring hymns together.

It is inspiring even to think of so many people now joining in worship with the same music in their hands, singing with a new confidence and feeling born of actually knowing the hymns, singing with the choir, not haltingly after them.

For the success of the NEW HYMNAL is the success of every church that uses it, bringing a new inspiration to our devotional service, a new unity to our religious expression.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"He came down to you that ye might always go up to Him."

Religion is the true fertilizer of human genius.—Bushness.

Oh, without Christ there would have been no Christmas! How poor would be life without the gift of God to man of His Incarnate Son!

The face of Christmas glows all the brighter for the cold. The heart warms as the frost increases.

Self-control and faith are not only strength to their possessor; they also enable him to impart strength to others.

If we would know truth, we must not expect to advance by intellectual certainty, but by spiritual power. The truth must be a life. As we live true to His ascended Being, we must und the power of that life. The Spirit of Truth is the Spirit of Life, so that, as we live by His inspirations, we are taught the fulness of His mysteries.—R. M. Benson.

Though Christ a thousand times
In Bethlehem be born,
If He's not born in thee,
Thy soul is still forlorn."

He stooped to bless,
And stooping, raised us. And the tenderness
Which looked in pity on a world of sin
Long years ago,
Still waits in love to call the nations in,
Till all shall know
How man may rise in Him to holiness,
Because He stooped so low.
A. R. G.

It is man's highest privilege and first duty to discover what God's plan or purpose of life for him is. To find that out and do it is to live to some purpose. God has some special work for each of us to do. And no life is so insignificant or worthless.

God bless that little Christmas land,
And make our own land brave and free!
Firm may our country ever stand,
But may we keep in memory
The Syrian land that gave Him birth
In lowly place upon the earth.

Did it ever strike you that goodness is not merely a beautiful thing, but by far the most beautiful thing in the world; and that badness is not merely an ugly thing, but the ugliest thing in the world? So that nothing is to be compared for value with goodness, that riches, honor, power, pleasure, learning, the whole world and all in it are not worth having in comparison with being good; and the utterly best thing for a man is to be good.—Charles Kingsley.

Ring, happy bells of Christmas,
Peal forth in jubilee;
Foretell with blissful voices
The great new world to be.
O Earth, send back your answer
To the glorious angel song,
Light for the darkness, love for hate.
Right for the ancient wrong.
—Emile W. McVea.

LIFE IN THE LIGHT OF CHRISTMAS

Why do we keep Christmas? Why, in great cathedrals rich with all the reverence of the centuries and in rude chapels new with yesterday, will men meet to worship on that day? What is it that we still celebrate, now that many centuries have come and gone?

The supreme event of history, we say. The one most mighty cause for wonder and for adoration which the heart of man has ever known.

But it seemed not so to most of those who lived in that far year when first there was a Christmas. A Child was born in Bethlehem; but what was that? Wherein was ground for wonder there? Should the ears of Caesar deign to listen to such common things? Should Rome hush the voices of her pride and power and turn toward a province to hear a baby's cry? The world was full of mighty things, and this was insignificant. Who cared for one child more or less in Judah? The concerns that mattered were of a different sort. Were there not new games promised for the arena? Were there not new spoils and ships of corn, from conquered provinces? Were there not tidings of new victories for the legions? Was it not plain that the greatness of Rome should go on increasing with the years? What did the birth of the child of a peasant mother have to do with this?

And there were others who might have asked the question with equally little thought of any answer. These were all the exploited peoples of the provinces which Rome had conquered. These were they who paid her grinding taxes. These were the masses of her captives whom she had made into her slaves. What would life ever hold for them which was different from what they knew? What could a child in Bethlehem mean to them?

Yet the answer is the whole incredible miracle which the centuries cannot exhaust—a miracle which is wonderful not because it seemed so great, but because it seemed so small. A child was born—that only. Yet because of that a force had entered history which was to transform old stubborn facts which seemed so permanent. In Him a spirit was let loose which should bring down the mighty from their seats and exalt the humble and meek. Gradually the civilization of the earth should be transformed because the motives which should enter into it had been given a new direction by the life which was born of Mary.

Yet we today, like the worldly-wise of long ago, are slow to understand that wondrous fact. Still we think that those things which mouth and strut upon the stage of earth are the mighty things. We are overawed by the implements of power, and cannot catch the still, small secret of the power of life itself. We think that the legions and the triremes, the armies and the navies, the crowns and sceptres and kingdoms and principalities, the money and the luxuries, are the controlling facts in human destiny. But we are wrong. These are but as dust before the eternal creativeness of the human spirit. The message of the Incarnation is that in one single soul possessed by God there is might enough to master all the stuff of earth and to mould it by a higher will.

At this Christmas time, therefore, let us understand afresh the grandeur and the challenge of life. Sometimes we are dismayed by the ancient evils that press upon us; but there is no need to be afraid. From the evils that may be without, let us look toward the glory that may dawn within. If in our own hearts and in the heart of the Church Christ be born anew through our obedience, there is no limit to the redemption which the power of the Incarnate One may work today.

ONE WAY TOWARD PEACE AND GOOD WILL

In the Southern Churchman of December 3 we printed an article by Bishop Parsons, of California, on the League of Nations, and an editorial in which we expressed our sympathy with his championship of the League as an adventure born of a better faith in the future of international relationship. A few days ago we received from one of our correspondents a letter which is published in another column of this issue. The writer takes exception both to Bishop Parsons' article and to our editorial. With some hesitation we print his letter exactly as he wrote it, for his words do not seem to us—and we wonder whether as he reads them they will seem to him?—to be chosen always with a careful courtesy. But for what we doubt not was the earnestness of his spirit, we welcome his essential message—the more so because what he has written gives us further opportunity to measure what we believe against its opposite.

Our correspondent speaks of our "attempted but admitted failure to think out a satisfactory reply" to Bishop Parsons' inquiry as to why the Federal Council of the Churches made no reference to the existing League of Nations in its recent pamphlet, "The Church and a Warless World." Therein his controversial imagination is more lively than precise. Certainly we had not "admitted" any such failure. Whether the "failure" was there or not, is susceptible to the test of facts; and to that test we shall now invite him.

What we said in commenting upon Bishop Parsons' question was this: that we believed the Federal Council of Churches does honor and value the existing League of Nations and the purpose which it embodies, and that the reason why no mention of the League was made in the recent bulletins was simply because the Council felt that advocacy of the League of Nations as an immediate factor in an international policy which America should share "would be inexpedient on account of the political partisanship which this might run foul of," and that the Federal Council may well have thought "that the most helpful thing the churches could do would be to bring to bear pressure along the lines in which the administration was willing to go, and not along those which, for the present at least, are barred by political reasons."

Our correspondent implies that the Federal Council of Churches, if allowed to speak for itself, would have a very different statement to make. As to that, we submit the following:

Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America,
National Offices,
105 East Twenty-second Street, New York,
December 8, 1921.

Rev. W. Russell Bowie, "The Southern Churchman," Richmond, Va.:

My Dear Dr. Bowie:

I appreciate very much your courtesy in calling my attention to Bishop Parson's article, entitled, "Have We Forgotten the League of Nations," and to your editorial comment upon the same, under the heading, "The League of Nations."

Your editorial states so effectively the point of view of the Federal Council of the Churches, as I understand it, that further comment is hardly necessary. Your suggestion that the Federal Council probably "thought that the most helpful thing that the churches could do would be to bring to bear pressure along the lines in which the administration was willing to go and not along those which, for the present at least, are barred by political reasons," states the situation as I see it.

Perhaps it will be worth while to recall briefly the positions which the Federal Council has taken from the very beginning with reference to the League of Nations. At its annual meeting in December, 1918, a declaration was adopted in which this paragraph occurs:

"The time has come to organize the world for truth and right, justice and humanity. To this end as Christians we urge the establishment of a League of Free Nations at the coming Peace Conference. Such a League is not a mere political expedient; it is rather the political expression of the Kingdom of God on earth."

At the annual meeting in 1919 action was also taken, as the official records show, expressing the Christian interest in the League of Nations and calling "upon the ministers and churches of the nation to exert every possible influence upon the President and Senate of the United States to secure the immediate ratification of the Covenant of the League of Nations with such reservations only as are necessary to safeguard the Constitution of the United States."

At the meeting of the whole Council in Boston last December, the message to the churches adopted by the Council included this paragraph:

"We welcome the development of a League of Nations which shall be in truth an association of free peoples for the achieving of world peace, for mutual disarmament, and for constructive service, and we call upon our own nation to join with other nations in moving along this new pathway of hope."

So far as the pamphlet under discussion, "The Church and a Warless World," is concerned, the insistence upon "a permanent society of nations" as essential to the conservation and development of the achievements of the Washington Conference indicates clearly the concern for what is the heart of a League of Nations, even though the phrase is not used.

Is it not the path of wisdom for those who are deeply concerned to have the United States enter into permanent, organized co-operation with the other nations of the world to lay their emphasis upon this step rather than to insist upon any special shibboleth or any special form of organization which may only perpetuate the partisan spirit which has hitherto kept us from assuming our international responsibility?

Very sincerely yours,
SAMUEL McCREA CAVERT.
Secretary.

With this letter we think the question may rest as to whether or not we correctly interpreted the attitude of the Federal Council.

But there is a very much more important question than that of whether this one or that one interprets correctly the mind of the Federal Council. It is the question of whether we all are trying to interpret correctly the mind of Christ.

The Southern Churchman is swift to admit that there were some features in the League of Nations which might cause unselfish and high-minded men to disapprove it, if they saw those features, and saw those only. It was linked with the whole Treaty of Versailles, which contained provisions repugnant to many liberals, as for instance the handing over to Shantung to Japan. We can understand that one who sincerely doubted the efficacy of the League as an instrument for righteousness would object to such a sweeping advocacy of it as seemed to imply that all Christians must support it exactly as it stands, and that those who will not are not Christians. But of course that is not really Bishop Parsons' message; nor has it ever been ours. There is room for difference of judgment as to the League of Nations as a finished instrument; but among Christians there ought not to be differences as to the League of Nations as an ideal.

But the grievous fact is that we have failed to be united and to be explicit, in behalf of the ideal which the League of Nations was meant to embody; and it is this which Bishop Parsons pointed out. The League exists. It is the only existing agency devised to fashion a new international relationship constructively in peace. Many of the leading statesmen of the world have so genuinely believed in its essential soundness, and its ability as a living thing to slough off its limitations, that they have championed it as the hope of an all but despairing world. The vast majority of the civilized peoples of the earth have entered into it. Can we in America dare to scoff at the awful greatness of the hopes which are centered there? Can we ignore our obligation either to enter that League or else to present immediately the only vindication of our remaining out of it—namely, the formulation of a new plan which shall offer to the nations a basis for peace which conserves all the ideals, and avoids the mistakes, which may be embodied in the present one?

The terrible truth is that many in America have not only condemned what all might admit to be the imperfections in the League of Nations, but they have fleered at the very thing which was its glory. They have shrugged their shoulders at the suggestion of America's world responsibility. In Congress, on campaign platforms, and in the columns of newspapers men have darkened all the sky of idealism with the thick breath of a selfishness that rose like vapor from a swamp. They have talked in terms of satisfied greed and fear and narrow cunning. George Harvey, in London, was only the most vulgar spokesman of opinions which many had been making familiar. It was as though Pilate were being made a patron saint, and the washing of our hands from all responsibility for a world crucified in agony had become the symbol of our satisfaction.

Can that be Christian? Whatever we think about the mechanics of the existing League of Nations, can we as Christians escape the compulsion of the great hope which idealists tried to incarnate there? In this Christmas time, with its message of peace to men of good will on earth, can we forget our responsibility to organize good will? Let those who believe in the League of Nations believe in it and pray for it still. Let those who doubt its efficacy remember that they dare not rest until, with the challenge of its attempt before their eyes, they either change their minds about it or create a better thing in place of it to organize among the nations the spirit that must bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

The words and laws of Christ, which do not change, and cannot fail, must not be left in the dead print of closed and dusty Bibles, or in the sermons of preachers, or the hymns of choirs and congregations. They must be faced and accepted and worked out into the warp and woof of daily life by every one of us who bears Christ's name.—Selected.

If you are wholly surrendered unto Love, God will stoop down and use you. You will become a hand of God, and the power of Love will be behind you as the body of your strength. The benediction of Christ will breathe through your presence wherever you may be, and the sweetness and sanity of Love will flow from you always in healing and in blessing.—Exchange.

THE GLORY OF CHRISTIAN WOMANHOOD

By the Rt. Rev. Edwin S. Lines, D. D.

IT is a fitting time to plead with our women to use their influence in a definite way for whatever makes for the good of the community, for whatever raises and maintains a high standard as regards manners and morals. Every one can do something to make her town or city a better place in which to live, to make the conditions favorable for the growing up of the boys and girls into a fine manhood or womanhood. No matter how hard the conditions may be, it is always worth while bearing witness and contending for what is better. Such a course is much wiser than complaint of existing conditions.

The drawing of a great many of the girls and young women into offices and stores, and many forms of business makes a special demand upon you to watch over them, to help them through the temptations to be frivolous in conduct and careless in dress. The desire for amusement and companionship is altogether natural, and you must endeavor to meet this desire in wholesome ways. The thoughtful words, the personal interest of good women will save both boys and girls from drifting on into life without determined effort to make the most and best of themselves, without development of character and ablity, so that they find themselves in middle life or age without the power to do anything that is fine and noble. Do not be satisfied with general ideas of what the new generation ought to be. Be appreciative rather than critical. Many more words of complaint than of commendation are heard in our homes. It is rather surprising that under their circumstances men and women do as well as they do. Little good comes from complaining and finding fault, while much good comes from patience, appreciation and friendship.

The training of the child is the noblest and most important work there is in this world, and it is within the range of every woman's life, whether there be children in her own home or not. The manner and aims of a woman's life must be high and fine, if she would command the respect of the child. God has ordered human life with a long childhood and youth, a long period of helplessness and immaturity to teach us the supreme need of patience, self-sacrifice, kindness and pity, and to give the place of highest influence in the world to women. The Holy Child at Bethlehem and Nazareth and His Virgin Mother grip the world still, and there is something wrong with man or woman who responds not to the lesson there taught. The mother's work seems hard and often of the nature of drudgery, but it is the real work which counts as nothing else in the making of this world what it ought to be.

Lord, had I lived in Bethlehem,
All gladly had I gone with them
Who brought Thee gifts of fragrant spice
And gold:
But now how can I give to Thee
Whom I cannot behold?

So asked I—and on Christmas morn
I saw a little Child forlorn
And loveless, and I seemed to hear
A Voice,
That said, "He gives to me who makes
My little ones rejoice."

W. R. B.

Let me plead with all the women whom my voice or word may reach, not to spend their time in petty and frivolous gossip; not in playing bridge, a game which has done much to destroy social, kindly and neighborly life. See if you cannot get neighbors such as we used to have back into this unfriendly world. Teach the boys to be brave and strong in bearing pain and doing what is hard; to be clean in their thinking, reading and friendships, to respect womanhood as a vital test of character. Teach the girls to be modest, seemly in dress and conduct, not loud and forward, with high purposes as regards the use of their lives; tell them to hold their heads up, their ears uncovered, and their feet on the ground as God intended they should; tell them that no woman of self-respect smokes and that it is a shameful thing for a girl or woman to do; tell them to leave their faces fresh and fair as God made them. Do not bring into your homes, whether at the table or in the living-room, gossip and small talk about the church, or the sermon, or the church music or anything of the kind. Many men are influenced against the Church and attendance therein, by the small talk and chatter about Church matters brought into their homes. The boys and girls cannot grow up with profound respect for the Church and religion who have listened in their homes to small talk and gossip about Church matters.

Women can do a great deal to raise the tone of life in the community. The public library ought to have its place and adequate support in every village, town or city. In some parts of New England the law requires that every town, however small, shall maintain a public library. It is discreditable to us that there is not such a library in many more of our communities. Let the beginning be made in a small way if necessary, but let Church women give leadership in establishing such libraries and making them attractive places of resort for readers, centers of intellectual life. They will develop better men and women than picture shows. Let a protest be made against the moving picture shows which cultivate familiarity with wickedness and cruelty, and things which are shameful. Put over against what is bad, that which is good. Fasten responsibility for the existence of what is unseemly and degrading upon the guilty persons and let publicity do its work. Many people go wrong because they have no resources, nothing to occupy their minds, nothing to make them think, no good, wholesome places of resort.

Women who are not sensitive about their social position, who can afford to establish friendships with other women without thinking of themselves, are a great blessing. You ought to treat the women, into relation with whom you are brought in the stores, or in any form of service whatever, with consideration, never patronizing anybody. Women ought to wear plain clothes in church, leaving all their finery at home, that the women who must dress plainly may feel at home in the house of God. Women ought to have an intelligent interest in the public questions of the time, like proper housing, unemployment, the making of the city or town clean and attractive. At such a time as this make all the work you can for the unemployed, especially for those of moderate means and pay good wages. It is the time to have work done, and generous payment for honest work to self-supporting, self-respecting men and women is much better than alms. Do not be irritated because some people, who might have work, are idle; be in sympathy with all the endeavors of underpaid and unprivileged people to improve their condition by better wages and obtaining the comforts of life which have been very unequally divided. Have regard for the small dealer, the man or woman who is trying to maintain a small business or earn a modest living in an honest way. Do not run about for bargains, for they generally mean that some one is poorly paid and in a hard place in life. Save all the people you can out of the clutches of the quack doctors and the advertisements of quack medicines in newspapers whose owners ought to be ashamed of the use made of their columns.

Be good neighbors, friendly Christian folk, live your religion as well as profess it. Let God be praised for what good women have done to extend the Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Get into the company and succession of the women who minister to the Lord Jesus, as truly in ways which I have named as women in gratitude to Him did in the days when men and women for their blessing heard His gracious words and looked upon His blessed face.

MARCELLA

The Story of An Ancient Christmas

By Mrs. William Gordon McCabe

IT WAS the latter part of December, in the year of our Lord 360, in the imperial city of Rome. Tiberius was Bishop of the Church. At a period somewhat later, St. Ambrose became Bishop of Milan, where he baptized St. Augustine, and on that memorable occasion is reported to have improvised the immortal "Te Deum." His young sister, Marcella, catching from him the divine passion of self-sacrifice, was to be consecrated on Christmas Day as the nun, or bride of Christ.

Christmas—then called Natalis—a new festival in the Church, more recent than Easter or Whitsuntide, was inaugurated by the fathers for the purpose of restraining the Christians from the Bacchanalian revels of the heathen, for the period of the winter solstice beheld the orgies of the Saturnalia, and the festivities of Burmalia, in honor of pagan deities.

Said St. Chrysostom, "the golden-mouthed," in his Christmas homily, at Antioch:

"Separate yourselves from the heathen, and at the change of the year, do the opposite of what they do; they give each other gifts, give ye alms instead; they sing worldly songs, chant ye the praise of God; they throng the theater, come ye to the church; they drink themselves drunk, do ye fast."

On Christmas Eve, a young Roman Senator and a maiden were wending their way homeward from the services of the church. The azure sky of the Italian night, brilliant with stars, smiled on them, and soft breezes from the Campagna fanned their cheeks, but a deep shadow rested on the noble brow of the youth as he gazed on the lovely face beside him. At last he said:

"Is there no hope of changing your resolve, Marcella? Have you determined fully to take on you tomorrow vows which will separate you from me forever? Why need you do this, Carissima? Can it make you love your Lord Jesus less faithfully to become my wife? How can you fancy I would ever come between your soul and heaven?"

"Urge me no more, my Lucius," answered the girl, firmly, yet with sadness. "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers says St. Paul, and I dare not disobey. Thou knowest I give no halfway portion in love, or in religion. Whatever may be the case with others, with myself I know it to be true that I cannot serve God and Mammon. So I have decided to devote myself entirely to Christ, to betroth myself to Him in an eternal spiritual union, and to renounce utterly the follies and vanities of earth."

"This hair," she said, touching the magnificent masses of burnished gold, "which you have so often praised, must be shorn. I shall have neither time nor inclination for braiding it; these hands, whose shapeliness you have admired, shall learn to minister unto the needs of the sick and sorrowing; and this face, which men have called fair, shall find other uses than the reflection of the mirror or the flatteries of the world."

"You are a fanatic, Marcella, and I am the victim of your fanaticism. You never loved me, or you could not sacrifice me so easily for a crucified Jew. You were my betrothed bride ere you became a Christian, and why should you forsake me now? Is it the influence of your brother, Ambrose?"

"Perhaps he has been the instrument in God's hands to show me my duty, but, Lucius, there is another, and a more prevailing reason, even my intense desire for your salvation. That you may be converted, become a Christian, and turn from your gods to the Saviour of men, is the burden of all my prayers; and for your sake I devote my life to supplication and intercession, to penance, and to fasting." She paused, and raising her streaming eyes to heaven, said: "Farewell, now, my beloved, a long farewell! Remember, it is your unbelief which has parted us, and, unless you learn to believe, will part us forever; it is your unbelief which breaks my heart, and which, I fear will dim for me even the brightness of Paradise, though I leave the world to pray for you in secret and in tears."

She broke from him, and entered her home, which they had reached and he did not follow her; there was no hope of influencing her—he knew her heart, like wax at the touch of affection, but as adamant itself, when once the imperious voice of duty was heard. He walked through the illuminated streets. Every now and then some strange figure in mask flitted before him—some clown, or satyr, or peasant girl, throwing confetti, and then rushing off with shrieks of laughter. Out of tune with all this revelry, he strolled into the Appian Way, and found himself alone with his own somber thoughts. He looked up at the quiet stars, and pondered their inscrutable history. Who could bind "the sweet influences of Pleiades or loose the bands of Orion?" Did the wise men really "see a Star in the East," which guided their steps to the infant Redeemer, whose birth the Christians were now celebrating? Astrology was an ancient science. Had it, too, joined itself to the prevailing superstition? "We have seen His star in the East, and are come to worship Him," they said. Was this story of the Babe of Bethlehem anything but a pretty legend, a cunningly devised fable? Might it not be worth his while to look into it, if only for her sake?

One by one the starry hosts paled their fires, one single star only hanging low in the rosy East. The worshippers began to assemble with joyful anthem greeting the rising sun. "Glad tidings, glad tidings," they sang, "of great joy, which shall be to all people. The Day-spring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace. Peace on earth, good-will to men."

Then followed the "Gloria in Excelsis," chanted by the multitude (as a processional), as they wended their way with eager steps to the great church, for the services of this day were to be of even more than ordinary interest, and all were anxious to see the consecration of Marcella, the fair young sister of St. Ambrose.

In the twentieth century, we preach that every man and woman should be betrothed to Christ, and that we can serve Him best in that state of life wherein it has pleased God to call us. We have learned that > "The daily round, the common task,

> Will furnish all we ought to ask;
> Room to deny ourselves, the road
> That leads us daily nearer God."

But the saintly young girl felt otherwise, and fled from the entreaties of a heathen lover, to pray for his conversion in seclusion from the world. Reverently, she took the solemn vows on her young heart, as she repeated them with her lips, and meekly she hearkened unto the words of the Master, as the Bishop repeated them: "Whosoever hath left father, or mother, or brethren, or houses, or lands for My sake and the gospel's, shall receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come, life everlasting."

Earth and time faded from her vision, and the peace of the world to come "and life everlasting" dawned on her soul, as she fell on her knees, her head bent in fervent prayer for strength to devote body, soul, and spirit to the service of the crucified Lord. Softly chanted the multitude one of the triumphant psalms of David, loudly pealed the alleluias of the children, while the rejoicing presbyters and deacons cried aloud: "Amen! Amen!"

Among the throng regarding the scene, with stern face, was Lucius, the young Roman. Wrapping his toga around him, he went out from the church, carrying with him a memory, which haunted him many years afterwards, of a fair, glorified face, lost to him forever, as long as this life should last, and afterward—was there any afterward? He would try to find out for himself.

Many years had come and gone, and the religion of the lowly Nazarene, watered by blood and tears, had flourished and grown into a tree of fair proportions, whose leaves were full of "healing for the nations," and under whose branches multitudes had found rest for their souls.

Julian, the Apostate, was now reigning at Rome, and the 25th of December, with its festivities, both Christian and pagan, had dawned again on the Eternal City. It was whispered that it would not be displeasing to the Emperor to revive certain fearful features of the Saturnalia when the Christians had been butchered to make a Roman holiday; and eager throngs had repaired to the amphitheater with the savage cry of "CHRISTIANOS AD LEONES."

A group of Christian women were preparing their Christmas alms, food for the hungry, clothing for the naked, and dainties for the sick. Marcella went in and out among them, gentle and helpful, and undisturbed by the dark rumors floating in the air. Like the great apostle to the Gentiles, she knew what it was to "die daily," and death for the sake of the Master was shorn of all its terrors by the triumph of so many of "the noble army of martyrs." Had she not seen tender maidens kneeling to await the spring of the tiger, without a tremor, and had she not known hundreds to fall asleep, saying with Stephen: "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" Verily, they held not their lives dear that they might win Christ. Soon a herald proclaimed: "Let all true followers of the gods repair to the amphitheater." With a heavy heart, but hoping to render some assistance to the wounded and dying, Marcella followed the excited crowd. What was the scene that met her startled vision? A band of noble, stalwart men, manacled and just from prison cells, were led to the front for a mock trial before an infuriated heathen judge. Her ear failed to catch the minor questions, until the threatening words smote the still air.

"Dó you refuse to pray to the great Jupiter Tonans, the Father of Gods and men?"

"We do," came, with one accord, the quick response.

"Do you worship one Pretender, whom you call The Christ, and refuse to forsake Him, even for your life's sake?"

"We do," again without a tremor of fear or wavering.

"The penalty be on your own heads! Lictor, do your duty.

"Ad leones, ad leones!" echoed the enraged rabble.

Many a Christian woman recognized a husband or a brother, as the band of doomed martyrs were led to the arena, and their faces wore mingled expression of pain and exultation, as they lifted their clasped hands to heaven. Marcella's heart and eyes were raised in fervent prayer until she was aroused by the low tones of a voice, familiar and dear in days of the long ago, calling her name.

"Lucius, O Lucius," she exclaimed in an agony of grief and an ecstasy of triumph; "at last, at last, you are a Christian and a martyr!"

"By the grace of God and through your prayers, I am," he answered, "and even accounted worthy to die for His name's sake!"

"Thank God! Thank God!" she cried, "that He hath listened to the voice of my supplication."

The excited mob, pressing between, rudely tore them apart and, with one last look toward her, Lucius was seized by a brutal soldier and thrown headlong into the pit, the first man torn to pieces before her eyes.

After the day's carousal was over, in the darkest hours of the night, reverent hands found what was left of the mangled bodies, and, long years afterward, visitors to the catacombs discovered two lowly stones, side by side, inscribed:

"Marcella." "Lucius."

"Denique Coelum!" "Victoris Coronam Habet."

A NEWS LETTER FROM CHINA

By the Rev. J. M. B. Gill, D. D.

THIS letter can be but a chronicle of ordinary occurrences, evidence that we are all steadily grinding away at our regular work and slowly building up our station. Great events or unusual incidents, while interesting are at the same time somewhat disturbing to steady work, and it is the steady work that counts after all and makes possible the great events. We do not live on excitement out here, and so this letter can do no more than give you an idea of what an ordinary missionary does with his time from day to day.

In our last letter I spoke of Mr. Hickson's Healing Mission here in Nanking. We have tried to conserve the good results by continuing the healing services, making it a part of our regular routine. We have groups of Christians who have promised to pray daily for all the sick who apply for healing, whose names and diseases we send to every member of the respective groups. Each group also meets weekly for united prayer for the sick, and once a month all are requested to attend a celebration of the Holy Communion at which service the sick come to the Communion rail for the laying on of hands with prayer. We have had very satisfactory results from these services so far.

The Rev. Fan Kuang Hsi, whom the Bishop sent to take Rev. Mr. Chang's place, seems to be a very good man and is taking hold of the work with enthusiasm and intelligence. Our Chinese workers have many temptations and trials that we foreign workers do not experience and I hope you all will pray that they may be strengthened to meet them.

Both boys' and girls' day schools are full to overflowing. I really believe the only limit to the number of girls we can get is the capacity of our building. Four boys have applied for baptism this term and many of the girls are also applying. While this is a joy to us all it is also a great problem. Parents consent to their children's baptism quite readily these days, but it is very hard to make them understand just what their baptism involves. Especially difficult is the question of betrothals. The parents, you know, have absolute authority in this matter, and if we baptize a girl and then cannot prevent her parents from marrying her to a heathen, in most cases she finds it extremely difficult to keep up her connection with the Church after her marriage. On the other hand, we feel that it is not wise to keep putting off a girl or boy who really desires to enter the Church, it is apt to discourage them. Our only plan now is to make a special effort to get the parents to duly consider the spiritual welfare of their children when arranging marriages for them.

The Sunday evening services with the Reflectoscope pictures are going finely. If any of you have interesting postcards along travel, hygiene or commercial and manufacing lines we would be glad to get them for this use. We are not only using this service to illustrate and teach the gospel, but also to help the Chinese to get a broader vision of the world and society. This may help a little to keep them from that narrow nationalism which is one of the curses of the world of today.

The Rev. Warren A. Seager and Miss F. Catherine Deahl have joined our staff and are hard at work on the language, and I suppose we older workers are as much interested in their progress as they themselves. It will be such a help when they can take their place in the work.

In China we often see a literal fulfilment of some of Christ's sayings which to people at home must seem a little unreal at times. For instance I have a graduate of a Government School who decided to go into the ministry, as a result of this his father turns him out of the family. He is steadily pursuing his purpose realizing deeply, no doubt, that "he that loveth father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me." A fine Christian woman, the head of a public institution. is literally being hounded day and night by a crowd of rascals on account of her belief in Christ and her carrying out of His teachings in her business. She is accused before Governors and magistrates and summoned before legislative assemblies, where by her simple faith and transparent honesty and her courage she testifies to the power of Christ in human lives. She knows what He meant by "but beware of men for they will deliver you up to councils, and ye shall be brought before Governors and Kings for My sake, for a testimony against them and the Gentiles." Such things are not unusual in our daily round and it is always on our heart and in our prayers that these tempted ones may stand firm and glorify God in their day.

Then, there are other things: The carpenter comes to be told how to build this or that, the mason to know how he must lay a walk, the school teacher to beg you to find some money for an extra need in the school, a Christian's blind cousin has fallen and broken her wrist—what can you do about this, an official would like you to get him an English teacher. Time for a class in school now. Then the clergyman comes to talk over some straying sheep. The catechist is wanting this or that. The poor Biblewoman has a problem, a Christian widow has just carried off her unemployed son, can't we lend the bridal couple a room until he finds some work. The coolie comes to complain that some one is trying to overwork him. The Chinese writer is asking for the lists of the sick who are to be prayed for, and that reminds you of a chart that must be ready for Sunday's Bible class. Now it is time to go to that committee meeting about the united prayer service for the Pacific Conference, but just as you start a college girl comes to know if you can lend her Tennyson's poems. Back from the committee after dark to find that while you were out some one called on important business, you must go right out and see him, but what about the two vestrymen who are coming to supper and to plan for the Social Service Club—well, let's get one of the language students in the house to play host until you can get back. At last the conference is over, and you are ready to call it a day and go up to bed, but there is a great banging at the door and down you go prepared for most anything, but it is only a telegraph messenger who says, "If this manage is not yours whose is it and where does he live please." Then it is really over, but the sermon that ought to have been written must go over as "unfinished business." Before bed there are lots of people and things to be prayed for, omissions and mistakes to be recalled perhaps, but after all it has been just a usual day. "Are we down-hearted." NO! It's just GREAT—and by the way, so is that bed when at last you do get into it.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

A CHRISTMAS PRESENT TO THE WORLD.

It looks as though two great peace plans would be near enough to completion before Christmas Day to be counted on as accomplished facts.

One of these is the Irish settlement, for which every one is devoutly thankful, and which removes a great cloud, not only from our great mother country of Britain, but also from our own midst. There are enough citizens of Irish descent scattered through this country to have created great sympathy for the Emerald Isle had a war of conquest been necessary to bring an adjustment of differences.

The other is the "Four Power Pact," which takes a long step toward the prevention of war.

Irrespective of political affiliation, every Christian person should be in hearty favor of the ratification of this plan, and if it seems necessary we should let our Senators know where we stand on the subject.

Since Senator Lodge openly advocates it for the Republicans, and almost all of the Democrats, by their advocacy of the League of Nations, are more or less bound to support this arrangement which is much the same thing in modified form, it would seem to be impossible to block its passage.

No one can tell, however, what may turn up in politics. We lost the League of Nations through bitter partizanship on the one hand and the indifference of Christian people on the other.

It behooves us to be vigilant now, and see to it that this great Christmas present to the world is not lost before it is delivered.

Of course, there are those who feel that Mr. Harding and his friends have stolen the credit from Mr. Wilson and his administration, but if now such motives should inspire opposition to the arrangement, it would only be showing a littleness that would be smaller than that which animated the opposition to the "League of Nations."

What we all desire is the peace of the world. It can safely be left to history to decide to whom the credit shall be given.

There can be no finer Christmas present to the world than the adoption of some form of international agreement that shall put war further into the background.

A JOLT.

The world seems to be getting on pretty well. Lots of people go to church, and we hear of innumerable little acts of kindness and unselfishness, and, on the whole, one has no reason to say that one is not living a Christian life in a Christian community.

Then comes an awful surprise. In a speech before an advertising club a statistical authority tells that body in a Southern city that more than a million and a half dollars are spent every month by that community in luxuries. This statement is not only made, but it's proved to be true by internal revenue figures.

That tax of one cent on ice cream cones, on soda water, moving picture show tickets and the like, which is sometimes called the nuisance tax, tells this story about a city of approximately 175,000 people, a city which prides itself, and justly prides itself, upon its large proportion of church-going people.

And the shocking thing about it is that in that very same city the Associated Charities put a campaign on to raise sixty thousand dollars for its annual budget—and failed—failed by forty thousand of getting for a year's work of relief a sum that is spent 250 times in one month for luxuries.

That is a jolt, isn't it?

It is probably true, too, of dozens of other cities all over the country.

Of course, there are some extenuating circumstances. The city referred to, like most of our municipalities, has not yet grasped the importance and ultimate necessity of community chest. Consequently, its many charitable institutions, and it has a large number, have a sort of "catch as catch can" time of it getting their various needs looked after and properly financed.

The result is that there are many calls on the public and people get tired of being "dunned," and do not give nearly as much as they would if there was just one big call that would be properly divided among all the worthy needs.

Another advantage of the community chest plan is that thousands of people are reached who do not otherwise contribute. In cities where this plan has gone into effect like Detroit and Cleveland, it has been found that people give more liberally and more numerously.

But to go back to our comparisons in the city we have mentioned. Although there are other calls for relief there, the Associated Charities is recognized as by far the most important, and all the others probably not more than equal its budget.

Suppose, however, that the entire expenditures for charity of all kinds came to $200,000, and it would certainly not exceed that figure. Then it would mean that only a little over one-tenth of what is spent in a single month on luxuries alone is put in a whole year in brotherly love.

Such figures, too, could no doubt be duplicated in most American cities.

We are not pessimistic; far from it; but it is well now and then to have our attention concentrated on something like this to impress upon us that there is still lots of need for improvement in our philanthropic life, and for the preaching and the practice of Christian liberality.

GOOD WORDS FROM JAPAN.

There are those in the Japanese Parliament who are as eager for peace as any of our statesmen can be, as is shown by the following extract from a speech of Mr. D. Tagawa, one of the anti-militarist leaders in that body. He said:

"Speaking as an independent parliamentarian, I desire to describe the 5-5-3 armament ratio as an impartial plan. I give it my full assent. I cannot, however, help feeling that the 500,000 tons for America, the 500,000 tons for England and 300,000 tons for Japan leave too heavy a burden upon the people of our three countries. The reduction is inadequate. The armament taxes will still prove too great a weight. I had hoped that Mr. Hughes would suggest an even more drastic cut. In this feeling I am not alone. Others who believe in armament limitation must share the same hope. We, therefore, who hold to the faith of "the less armaments the less war" must energize ourselves for an untiring campaign looking to greater reductions in the near future. Please join with us in such activities.

Secondly, I wish today to record my impressions of Mr. Briand's elaborate address. I sat and listened with profound interest. Full well I recognized the able oratory of that hour. But in the contents of that oration I found much to give me disappointment. I came to this conference with a deep admiratioon for France. More than any other nation she has been torn and mangled by the barbarities of war. Her wonderful people laid their all on the altar to save their nation and the world from the menace of unbridled force. I had hoped to find the leaders of this versatile nation showing the same capacity in making peace as they had shown in making war. But Mr. Briand's address differed from my hope. It seemed to me, instead, to indicate that in France there still survives the old idea of reliance on force instead of friendship.

If France today could only indicate that for defense against the German or any other menace she places her confidence in peaceful means, there is no country so lacking in chivalry as to fail to rally for her defense in case of unjust attack. Even I, a non-military civilian, would rush to her rescue. With me a large group of Japanese young men would go to such a battle for freedom, humanity and justice. In America, too, yes, in all the world, exists to the full such a spirit. Why did not Mr. Briand see this?

There are treaties of peace and notes of international accord. But above these in effectiveness are the bonds of moral force."

MORE ANSWERS FROM OUR READERS

The Southern Churchman has offered prizes of twenty-five, fifteen and ten dollars for the best, second best and third best replies to these questions:

1. What feature of the Southern Churchman do you like best, and why?
2. What feature of the Southern Churchman do you like least, and why?
3. What feature not now contained in the Southern Churchman would you most like to see added?

The invitation will be open until December 31.

More answers have been received than the limitations of space will permit to be published—but here are some of them:

1. The feature of the Southern Churchman that I like best is "Christianity and the Community," edited by the Rev. R. Cary Montague.

This department, in a sensible, practical manner, deals with every phase of Christian Social Service. Christian duty for the nation, for the community, for groups, and for the individual is simply and clearly discussed, and no part of it overlooked as too vast or too trifling for consideration.

2. There is no feature of the Southern Churchman that I do not like, but if anything were to be left out I think fiction could best be spared from the "Family Department," for surely "grown-ups" do not need the incentive of moral tales for their spiritual guidance.

3. The feature I would like to see added would be a sermon each week, preferably one that has been delivered in some pulpit by a bishop or priest of our Church. Let discourses on timely topics be chosen occasionally, but select principally sermons on the fundamental facts of religion, the sacraments, the commandments, the salvation of souls through faith in Jesus Christ; in short, sermons on the eternal verities—good gospel sermons.

"The world is too much with us." We need sometimes to forget the problems of the day, which will pass away, and to be reminded instead, frequently, of the words of God, which will not pass away.

HORTENSE DAVIS.

1. I like best about the Southern Churchman its three B's; Bigness, Boldness, Broadness. It is big because it does not stoop to the discussion of little unimportant, controversial questions; bold because it stands for right, and when a principle is involved speaks without fear of unpopularity or disapproval; broad because it is "Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man," and gives wide opportunity for free expression through its pages.

2. I like least about the Southern Churchman its material form and method of arranging classified advertising matter. Somehow, plum-puddings, pipe-organs, summer hats, marriages and deaths seem not to belong in the same columns. However, things I do not like in the Southern Churchman are, on the whole, difficult to find.

3. I should like to see in the Southern Churchman a department of church music, to be called perhaps "Church Music," or "Chimes, Chants and Choirs." Music has ever played an important part in the church services, and the relationship, therefore, between organists and choir-masters and their employers must likewise be important. Musical services are often undignified and unchurchly. Words selected from unauthorized sources are often sentimental and sensational. The clergy have often failed to give preference to organists and choir directors of their own Church affiliations, engaging instead those outside who are often out of sympathy with the Church's work. These and many other conditions cloud our musical atmosphere. A free discussion weekly in the Southern Churchman along this line might be a great help.

MARY MINGE WILKINS.

1. I like the Letters to the Editor best, because they are very seldom dull. They have life in them, and they speak because they have something to say.

I wish the readers would write more. It shows that they care, that they are interested, and we want to have people interested; it is then that they do something; we want to have active and interested workers.

2. Christianity and the Community, I like least. It could be one of the most interesting, but it is not altogether an easy subject. Mentions of small incidents of practical life, and mentions of opportunities that have slipped by without being made use of. An over-long article will be skipped, and if so, that part of the paper might as well have been left a blank. Now, that would be a waste of paper and work. Shorter articles are needed, and more variety or more of them.

3. The feature or features I would like to see added is a few more pictures; pictures of hard and faithful working priests especially in the western mission fields; those who are working under hardships and discouragements, with small salaries, and without access to newer books and who seldom have an auto ride, and seldom, if ever, a vacation. Small photos of this kind would add interest to the subject.

And also, a few more editorials in each number, not lengthy ones, unless the subject justifies it. Also add a small corner for questions and answers. If people took an interest in living up to the requirements of our profession, you have no idea how many questions we would need to ask. Our pastors, many of them, are queer people. If you ask them why they never say the special prayer for Congress, for example, they will consider you a personal enemy ever afterwards. So you see that if we are to get any special information we must get it from some friendly outside source.

LEWIS OSTENSON.

As your valuable paper has been a welcome visitor in our family for more than forty years, will answer in brief form your three questions, though it is a difficult task:

1. I like best the Letters to the Editor. Why? Because they give us such helpful and newsy material from home and abroad.

2. I must say (though I hate to have to admit it), I like least the advertising department, as I seldom read an advertisement. But it must be remembered that it is from the advertising material a paper gets that keeps it going.

3. I know of no new feature that I would like to see added, as I consider the Southern Churchman is about just as good as it can be made for the money, and should be in every family, as I consider it the "key" to all religious matters. It is by far the best religious paper I know of.

WM. H. H., Jr.

1. "What feature of the Southern Churchman do you like best"? The Editorials. Why? Because of the uplift, vigor and vision.

2. "What feature of the Southern Churchman do you like least"? The NAME, that is to say, the word "SOUTHERN." Why? Too sectional, exclusive, narrow. Strike out "Southern" and so be more in the spirit of the age. The name "Evangelical Churchman" is fine, but that change in our day would shock some people, and quite a few would have a bad case of religious nervous prostration. "The Catholic Churchman" or "The Churchman at Work" are good.

3. What feature not now contained in the "Southern Churchman" would you most like to see added? Sermons or articles on "Church Unity." Why? The man on the street and outside of the church tires of our unhappy division. How can Christian folk pray for world peace when they are not at peace among themselves?

J. SMITH ORRICK.

1. Its bold defense of the truth, and, above all, the truly Christian spirit with which it deals with questions in controversy involving a proper conception of what the Church teaches, and its opposition to the Romanizing influence that shows itself from time to time, especially among the so-called High Church party, causing some to fall away and disturbing the peace of mind of many of the faithful ones who remain.

2. The subscription price; would rather it be $2.

3. A Bible lesson or short sermon in concise form setting forth some truth in a manner conducive to spiritual growth and not burdened with technical terms that the average mind cannot grasp. E. H. MELLICHAMP.

Responding to your requests for readers' opinions of Southern Churchman, I admire most "Christianity and the Community," edited by the Rev. R. Cary Montague. It introduces fresh thoughts, and throws new light on many vital and interesting topics; it is inspiring and helpful. I enjoy "Home Department" and "For the Young Folks." The reading is very instructive and interesting. I would like a fuller account of missionary work, as so many persons do not see The Spirit of Missions.

"Thoughts for the Thoughtful" is a collection of gems. I love them.

I think so many advertisements detract from the sacredness of our superior, religious family paper.

MATILDA GRAMMER THORNTON.

MORE THAN A MILLION DOLLARS MUST BE COLLECTED IN DECEMBER.

Once more we enter the final month of the year with over a million dollars due the Church.

Last year we collected almost a million in December and this year we must do better.

Our position today is:

Estimated pledges, 1921.....$3,200,000
Received to November 30, 1921..... 2,035,870

To collect in December.....$1,164,130

Remember that this money has already been appropriated and most of it spent.

Church of England News

An Act of Remembrance.

Of the many striking ceremonies of Armistice Day not the least impressive was the ',Act of Remembrance" in the Central Hall, Westminster, in the evening, organized by the Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard and the staff of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. Though the day happened to fall during the bi-centenary celebrations of the famous church, it was the vicar's desire, as he expressed it, to "keep ourselves and our church absolutely in the background." The occasion was a memorable one—memorable not only for the size of the assembly and its quiet demeanor (there was no applause), but also for the intensity and fervor of the speakers and the frankness with which they gave utterance to their sentiments. The poignancy of the occasion was reflected in the speakers, for one and all were obviously moved—Mr. Studdert-Kennedy, indeed, spoke with an emotion so real and deep as to make him apologize for a show of that weakness to which the strongest among us are susceptible. "It has all seemed like Good Friday without any Easter Day," he said, in the course of an impassioned address, the keynote of which was disillusionment and disappointment. But symbolic of the hope which ever sustains grief-stricken and broken humanity, in the middle of the platform stood a large, plain wooden cross with a laurel wreath at its base.

From the chairman came a final word of hope and encouragement. Mr. Sheppard expressed whole-hearted agreement with all that had fallen from other speakers, but, he added, as he passed the Cenotaph day by day, the words he would like to utter to those who had fallen were: "It was your death that taught me how wicked force is. It was your death that has made me thirst and long for brotherhood and peace. We talked of it before the war ,but nothing came of all our Hague Conferences. It wanted that terrible welter of blood to teach me and others what the horror of war really can be. By your death you taught us as nothing else could ever have taught us, that the world must live in peace and brotherhood." The last hymn, "For All the Saints," was then sung, and after the concluding prayers the chairman said, "Father, in Thy gracious keeping," the audience replying, "Leave we now Thy servants sleeping"—a touching and singularly beautiful finish to a deeply impressive occasion.

The Vicar of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields.

The Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard, popularly known as "Dick" Sheppard, is apparently one of the outstanding personalities in the Church of England. His name comes naturally into the Church weeklies, and one hears enthusiastic accounts of him from returning Rhodes scholars and other young Americans, who have been recently to Oxford and Cambridge. An announcement of the two hundredth anniversary celebrations of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields was made in this column two weeks ago. The Guardian reports that the entire celebration was unusually impressive. At the final devotional meeting, on Sunday evening, November 13, Mr. Sheppard brought the celebration to a close with "one of those extraordinarily simple, sincere and personal addresses which explain the great influence he has won. He spoke of our Lord. His friends, he said, did not understand Him, though they adored Him. When He said one thing they thought He meant another. So many of us thought He stood for things that possibly He never did stand for. But, baffled, eager, astonished, afraid, they followed because they had to, and so did we. He revealed to us our conception of God, and He had to be reckoned with still. The story of mankind must take into its reckoning that Man on Whom more devotion has been lavished than upon any other man who has ever lived. The over-mastering thought of His mind was His nearness to and trust in God, Whom He called Father, and His belief in the Kingdom of God, here and now, to which the Prayer Book referred hardly at all. He thought that God had only one weapon—love. When men hated you, love them. Win them through love; it was the only power. "In so far as we ever use anything except love we deny, I think, Jesus Christ."

Resignation of Dr. R. J. Campbell.

The Rev. R. J. Campbell, D. D., has decided to resign the living of Christ Church, Westminster. It is Dr. Campbell's intention to devote himself more to preaching and writing, his belief being that his principal vocation in life is that of a preacher, and that the responsibility of a parish in Westminster interferes with such labors. Dr. Campbell's resignation will take effect at an early date, but he will still be attached to the Diocese of London.

Advent Addresses by Bishop Gore.

A series of addresses on "The Deity of Christ" will be given by Bishop Gore on Sunday evenings in Advent in Grosvenor Chapel, South Audley Street. The subjects are as follows: November 27, "What Think Ye of Christ?" December 4, "The Belief of the Disciples"; December 11, "The Doctrine of the Church"; December 18, "The Difference It Makes."

A Y. M. C. A. Memorial Window.

A stained-glass window, which has been placed on the south side of the nave of Westminster Abbey by an anonymous donor in memory of the service rendered through the Young Men's Christian Association during the war, and of George Williams, its founder, was unveiled on Monday by Princess Helena Victoria.

The Future of Knutsford.

At a recent meeting of the Central Board of Finance the following resolution was adopted: "That in view of the serious deficiency in the accounts of the Central Board of Finance, the National Assembly directs it for the present to limit expenditure on training to service candidates at Knutsford Test School or elsewhere, and such civilian candidates as have already been accepted." A second resolution, to the effect that the Central Board of Finance should recommend to the National Assembly that the Knutsford Test School should be closed as soon as might be consistent with the equitable treatment of all concerned, was then considered, and was, after considerable discussion, adopted by 17 votes to 12.

The Guardian comments as follows upon this action: "Church people generally will have read with profound satisfaction the announcement we made last week as to the expenditure of the Central Board of Finance upon the training of ordinands. This is precisely the course we have urged for some time past, and we are gratified that its wisdom should now be recognized in the only practical way."

MEETING OF THE CHURCH HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

The autumn meeting of the Church Historical Society was held in the assembly room of the Church House, Philadelphia, on Monday, November 21. A very interesting paper on the founding of the Church in New Jersey was read by the Ven. Archdeacon Shepherd, of that Diocese. Some alterations in the by-laws of the society were proposed and officers nominated for election at the January meeting.

The president announced that rooms having been assigned to the society in the new Church House, its collections had been removed from Christ Church Neighborhood House, where they had been stored for many years, and were now being assorted and arranged so as to be accessible for use. The collection embraces some five thousand pamphlets, besides books and files of Church newspapers running back to the beginning of the last century. The collection is particularly rich in pamphlets belonging to the earlier part of that century relating to the controversies about Bishops Onderdonk and Doane, the Cummins schism, the St. Clement's troubles, etc. Any persons desiring to make a study of any historical period of the Church in this country, or of particular parishes, or who are interested in reading about them, are invited to visit the rooms and examine these collections. And the society will be pleased to become the recipient of any documents relating to the past history or the present conditions of the Church.

It is hoped that the membership of the society may be largely increased so as to provide an income to pay for the classifying and cataloguing and proper care of its collections and for printing papers. The annual dues are one dollar a year. Life membership, ten dollars.

AMONG THE CHRISTMAS BOOKS

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

THE GOLDEN FLEECE. By Padraic Colum. Illustrated by Willy Pogany. The Macmillan Co. Pp. 289. Price $2.00.

What a time this is for children to grow up in—if only those who are a little older are wise enough to show them the shining roads wherein their thoughts may go! Never was a day when children were so much considered in what men do and the things men make. Our schools have been reorganized to feed the wonder of the child mind which only latterly have we learned how to reverence; and from the publishers there pours a stream of books so aglow in substance and form with romance and loveliness that no boy or girl need pass through childhood any more with dreams unfed. Of such a kind is this new volume of stories by Padraic Colum, illustrated not only in black and white, but in beautiful full pages of color by Pogany with a grace like the frescoes of Greece. The stories of the Golden Fleece "and the heroes who lived before Achilles" carry the imagination back to the youth of the race, and they will stir old instincts of delight not only in boys and girls, but in maturer spirits, too.

THE KING OF IRELAND'S SON. By Padraic Colum. Illustrations and Decorations by Willy Pogany. The Macmillan Co. Pp. 316. Price $2.25.

Of this new edition of "a romance such as the old story-tellers of Ireland or of Gaelic Scotland might have told," all that has been said in the review of "The Golden Fleece" might be said again, and to it added the acknowledgment of an even fresher charm belonging to this book which goes for its sources to springs of folk-lore and imagination less familiar than the stories of Greece. Fathers and mothers who want to buy a gift-book for their boys and girls this Christmas need look no farther than this beautiful story—wherein are many stories; and they must be very busy or very stodgy fathers or mothers who, when the boys and girls have gone to bed, will not take the book for themselves and read on to see what these human beings and enchanters and giants will be doing next!

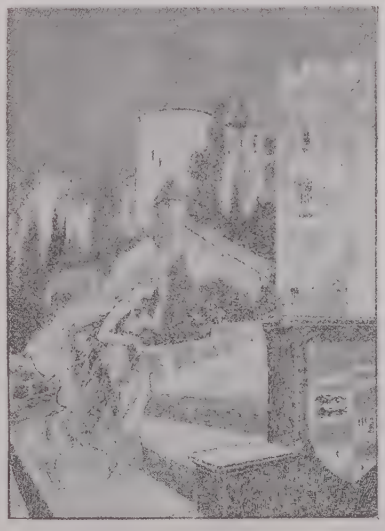
THE PATRIARCHS. } Two books by E. B. Trist
DAVID. } (Mrs. William C. Piercy). Illustrated in color by Arthur A. Dixon. Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.



In these books, printed in type which will make reading easy for a child (and make it pleasant for everybody) certain of the beautiful stories of the Old Testament are retold. "The Patriarchs" include the stories of Abraham and Isaac, Hagar and Ishmael, Isaac and Rebekah, and Jacob. In "David" there are gathered into one narrative the many incidents in the life of the hero-king.

The moralizing is sometimes a bit too obtrusive, and no re-telling can equal the incomparable simplicity of the Old Testament style; but the books have their distinct value because of their attractiveness to the eye, and because they bring together—separated from the material which a child might not understand—the stories which are scattered in different chapters of the Bible.

NEW PLAYS FROM OLD TALES. By Harriet S. Wright. The Macmillan Co. Pp. 180. Price $1.75.

Leaders of organizations of boys and girls are always on the lookout for dramatic material which will satisfy their young people's wish "to give plays," and often they look in vain. For some of the plays which are available are nothing but trash; and the ones with sound substance in them may be too elaborate and difficult for boys and girls to attempt. A real need is filled, therefore, when a book appears which gives material of fine quality in practicable form, and such a book is "New Plays From Old Tales."

From New Plays From Old Tales (courtesy of the Macmillan Co.)

The plays were written for New York Library Clubs with which the author is connected, and all of them have been put to the test of acting. They include folk-lore, fairy-tale and history, and among the titles are "Aucussin and Nicolette," "The Princess Who Hid Her Shoes," "Tamlane," from an old ballad for Hallowe'en; "Pilgrim's Progress" and "On the Old Plantation," taken from that old favorite of many children, "Diddie, Dumps and Tot."

There are illustrations by Leon D'Emo, a reproduction of one of which accompanies this review.

THE OLD TOBACCO SHOP. By William Bowen. Illustrations by Reginald Birch, New York. The Macmillan Company, 1921. Pp. 236. $1.75.

"To Billy and John, Two Little Boys," this book is dedicated, and many another Billy and John will have reason to be happy because of the book which belonged first to those two little boys. One does not always agree with publishers whose obvious impulse is to be enthusiastic, but, in this case, the reviewer can echo all their commendation. The book does remind us, as the publisher's note proclaims, "of Gilbert and Sullivan, and 'Alice in Wonderland" 'and 'Treasure Island,' and 'Dombey and Son,'" all at the same moment, and the illustrations suit the whimsical charm of the text.

From The Old Tobacco Shop (courtesy of the Macmillan Co.)

THE RAINBOW STRING. By Algernon Tassin. Illustrated by Anna Richards Brewster. The Macmillan Co. Pp. 114. Price $1.75.

Author and artist have combined to make a little book all bright with invitation for the eyes and ears of little boys and girls who will look at the pictures and listen to the stories when they are read at bedtime. For fairies and princesses and moon-bowls and all sorts of cheerful and unlikely things come at the bidding of the rainbow string.

BOOKS OF POETRY AND IMAGINATION.

OLIVER CROMWELL. A Play by John Drinkwater. Houghton-Mifflin Co. Pp. 6. $1.50.

In this new play Drinkwater has repeated the essential method of his widely known "Abraham Lincoln." Through all its progress moves one central and commanding figure, whose personality gives character to every element of the story. The play begins with 1639, when the protest was rising in England against the tyrannical exactions of Charles I and the Royalists who followed the example of the king in encroachments upon the liberties of the people. The first scene is in Oliver Cromwell's house at Ely, where John Hampden and Henry Ireton come to discuss with Cromwell the conflict that needs to be waged against the king. There follows a fine scene in the House of Commons at Westminster in November, 1641, where the Commons debate the memorial that is to be sent to Charles, and from which Cromwell comes out to find one of the laborers from his home at Ely, released after an arrest by the king's agents, mutilated in punishment for speaking against the taxes. "I call you to witness!" Cromwell cries. "That is a symbol. Before God I will not rest until all that it stands for in this unhappy England is less than the dust. Amen." Then swiftly the play moves on through a scene again in Cromwell's house at Ely, through the battle of Naseby in 1645, and on to the execution at last of Charles I.

As with "Abraham Lincoln," the extraordinary artistry of this new play of Drinkwater's appears most of all in the dramatist's power so to strip away non-essentials and to concentrate interest upon his dominant character, that one who follows the play feels that he has touched a living and heroic presence.

BILL BORAM. By Robert Norwood. George H. Doran Company. 1921. Pp. XIV, 96. $1.50.

A friend who was making up her list of Christmas gifts the other day asked the present reviewer to suggest a book which she might give to a number of her special and most discriminating friends, and the first book that he suggested was "Bill Boram." For in this book Robert Norwood, the preacher, who, because he must live and work in a particular place, can be heard in the pulpit by only a localized few, can give the message of his poetic spirit to many. Already he is widely known through his "The Piper and the Reed," "The Witch of Endor" and "The Man of Kerioth." And now, in "Bill Boram," his insight and the lyrical beauty of his verse make a new figure live in poetry.

Bill Boram is a skipper of a fishing schooner—

> "A green-hulled, cranky craft as ever drove > Her bowsprit into sea-foam."

And he was the "bad man of The Cove." But Bill Boram had in him a love of the beautiful—a love of flowers, and all sweet growing things. And through this gate of the beautiful, Bill Boram, though he treads not the road of the multitude, finds his way into one of the twelve gates of the Holy City of a redeemed life.

THE TRUCE OF GOD. By Mary Roberts Rinehart. George H. Doran Co. Pp. 96. $1.50.

A story with no extraordinary skill of character delineation nor of plot, but in conception sweet and wholesome—a story wherein the embittered spirit of a feudal lord is led through his love for a little child back at Christmas time to another love which he had almost thrown away. Marginal decorations and illustrations are attractively executed by Harold Sichel.

REYNARD THE FOX, or The Ghost Heath Run. By John Masefield. Illustrated in color and black and white by G. D. Armour and Carton Moorepark, New York. The Macmillan Company, 1921. Pp. XX, 339. $5.00.

Poet and publishers have combined to make a noble thing which every lover of books and of the beautiful will treasure. In a dramatic narrative poem John Masefield tells the story of a fox hunt in England, the gathering of the hunters at "The Cock and Pye," the start of the horses and hounds, the rousing of a fox in the Ghost Heath Wood, and the chase till evening of such a fox as had never been hunted before. A slight foundation for a poem which is to have anything but passing interest, one might think. But Masefield's genius has widened it into so many contacts with life that it suggests nothing so much as Chaucer in his descriptions of those who gathered for the hunt; and the story of the chase is more than a mere chronicle of one day's sport. It wakes old instincts that thrill to the chase, and larger and better still, it suggests the worth for our hurried life today of those virile energies of the out-of-doors which have entered so much into the blood of all the English-speaking races.

"I have been asked to write," says Mr. Masefield in his preface, "why I wrote this poem of 'Reynard the Fox.' As a man grows older, life becomes more interesting but less easy to know; for, late in life, even the strongest yields to the habit of his compartment. When he cannot range through all society, from the court to the gutter, a man must go where all society meets, as at the Pilgrimage, the Festival or the Game. Here in England the Game is both a festival and an occasion of pilgrimage. A man wanting to set down a picture of the society of England will find his models at the game."

We are glad he wrote, and glad for those who read it. For the wholesome gaiety of life, and the beauty of the out-of-doors, and the glory of wide spaces, as well as a larger understanding of our human folk, will enter the spirit as one follows the Ghost Heath Run.

How to Hold Young People in the Church

By William B. Hardy, Jr.

In order to hold young people in the church you must interest them, and the best way to accomplish that is to give them something to do. For instance, when a new member comes to a meeting of your Young People's Service League, put him on the program for the next meeting and he will have to come back. This will also give him the idea that he is part of the organization. Consequently he will become interested in it.

If you have no Young People's Service League, start one and make it a live wire organization. This will bring new members into the church and will hold the old ones. If you can manage it, hold your meetings before church on Sunday nights and then attend the service afterwards. This is one way to keep the older boys and girls interested in their church. Another way is by giving suppers, socials, dances and the like in your parish house. Don't be narrow-minded! Young people are bound to have a good time, and it's much better to have it in the house of God than in public dance halls, etc. As long as they are having a good, clean, healthy time, I say let them enjoy themselves. These things will cause them to spend more of their time around the church than down town at the picture shows, pool-rooms and so on. Am I not right?

Now then, for the younger boys. Have you a Boy Scout troop in your church? No! Well then, get busy and start one. There is nothing that a boy of twelve likes more than to go hiking and camping. Get a live young fellow who knows something of athletics, woodcraft and citizenship. He must be a man that the young boys admire. For example, if he has made a record in the two hundred and twenty yard low hurdles at college, played halfback on the 'varsity eleven, pitched on his school's team or is a returned soldier, sailor, or the like. The boys respect that sort of a man and will do anything he says. You will be surprised how soon you can form a troop. Gradually those boys will become more interested in their church, and in this way you are holding the younger boys and making them fit for future service in the church.

I don't know much about what the younger girls like, but I imagine that there are societies and things in which they can be interested.

Another thing we need to hold our young people in the church is a live Sunday school, one that accomplishes things. In order to secure this we should have a superintendent who knows his business and is a splendid executive. Also, we need trained teachers who really teach the children something. We need competition among the classes and something to strive for.

Remember our efforts and work throughout the different organizations mustn't be entirely devoted to religious things, or else the boys and girls will become disinterested. Have athletics in your churches and encourage them. Get up basketball and baseball teams, have tennis and golf tournaments, hold a track meet in the spring. There is nothing like these activities to bring out real spirit in young people for their church.

I could go on mentioning ways and means of holding our young people in the Church forever. There are many organizations, such as the Girls' Friendly Society, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and others that help a great deal, but in closing I wish to state what I think is the most essential need of all to hold our young people in our churches today. We need ministers who are big men, broad-minded, full of get up and go, or, in finer words, pep—men who can not only preach good sermons, but can lead in the different activities, men whom we admire not for their preaching, but for their good examples, men who have plenty of good, common business sense, for we must admit that salesmanship executive ability and the like are needed in our church. I firmly believe that ministers of this sort will do more towards holding the young people in the church than all the other things put together.

First, keep thyself in peace, and then thou shalt be able to make peace among others. . . . It is no great matter to associate with the good and gentle, for this is naturally pleasing to all, and every one willingly enjoyeth peace, and loveth those best that agree with him. But to be able to live with hard and perverse persons, or with the disorderly, or with such as go contrary to us, is a great grace and a commendable and manly thing.—Thomas a Kempis.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

"WHO SHALL REPRESENT US IN 1922?"

Mr. Editor: I was very glad to see your editorial, "Who Shall Represent us in 1922?" in the Southern Churchman of December 3, and hope that you will continue to keep the matter constantly before the Church.

As a member of the Prayer Book Commission, I am worried at the attitude of perhaps a majority of the Commission on the questions of the Holy Communion and "Black Letter Saints" among others—their views being on the line of the so-called "Catholic party," I am concerned about the possible final result.

T. W. BACOT.

Charleston, S. C.

CONCERNING THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. Editor: There is a story of an old colored man who had just been convicted of stealing chickens. "Rastus," said the judge after sentencing the culprit, "just as a matter of curiosity, I should like to know how you managed to get those chickens in broad daylight and right under the owner's window." "Jedge," replied Rastus, "you couldn't do it if I tole you. You'd best stick to yore rascality on the bench."

Don't you know that story came to mind in reading Bishop Parsons' indignant inquiry as to why the Federal Council of Churches failed to mention the League of Nations in its Bulletin on a warless world, and your attempted but admitted failure to think out a satisfactory reply to his inquiry, all of which appears in the Southern Churchman of December 3.

If the good Bishop were really seeking information, or if you were really attempting to enlighten him, it seems to me that either or both with perfect propriety could and should have inquired of the Federal Council of Churches, and no doubt would have obtained their views. No! the Bishop's inquiry and your editorial reply constitute something more than a shining example of the futility of the blind attempting to lead the blind.

From the critical nature of the remarks that follow both the question and the reply, even as a sermon follows a text, both appear to be partly an attack on "every Christian in America" who does not do true homage to the "League of Nations," and partly a criticism of the present administration of the United States Government because it is obeying the mandate of the most overwhelming majority of the electorate that was ever recorded, a majority that expressed its opinion on the very proposition you both discuss and a majority to which obviously neither belongs. I haven't the slightest doubt that in that vast majority were counted the votes of bishops, priests and deacons along with a goodly sprinkling of lesser but nevertheless intelligent saints, as well as wilful sinners and those ignorant ones beguiled by wily politicians.

I could quote recent history to you. I could, with the utmost honesty and sincerity, insist that all opposed to the League of Nations are not backsliding Christians, self-seeking politicians and foul-fiends with fleecy overcoats. I could suggest that if political expediency is to be discussed, one might call attention to those international political dickerings and expediencies which might arbitrarily place some peoples and tribes in perpetual bondage and which attempts to legalize a bald and serious theft from one of our best friends. I might even suggest that the Christians complained of as deserting the League of Nations which fathers these FACTS may have seen a great light. I might express the opinion that instead of those Christians suffering from softening of the vertebrae, as Bishop Parsons and you believe, a more proper diagnosis would show that scales have dropped from their eyes. But what's the use?

The difficulty, as I view it, is that a doctor is so apt to hang up his doctor's hood and leave his divinity behind when he descends to launch into a discussion of the mundane affairs of mankind. He pours out vials of wrath upon those who may offend by differing with him. And then you cry "Bravo!"

So without the thought of applying the words, or indeed without having precisely the same meaning in mind, nevertheless the underlying principle of the old darkey's statement to the judge seems to me not entirely irrelevant.

If this subject must be discussed as a Christian subject, in a Christian paper and by representatives of Christianity, why not show a bit—nay, a great deal of Christian charity, forbearance and respect for the conflicting views of others on the subject? In the same number of the Southern Churchman you mention with the utmost sympathy and regard those of the faith who have broadened their phylacteries and wear garments that smell of myrrh, aloes and cassia. Why not be as kindly affectioned toward opponents of the "League of Nations," who may be of the same household of faith otherwise?

It seems almost useless to conclude by stating the fact you have already guessed, that I am one of the opponents to the United States entering the present League of Nations. But even if I am not of the small body of the Bishop's elect, I hate to be thrust unceremoniously into outer darkness together with so many like-minded of my brethren, and you must admit that being thus treated, I at least have the right to protest by gnashing with such teeth as I have available.

CHRISTMAS.

The shepherds, pillowed on the sod,
Weary with watching, and forlorn,
Heard sweet-voiced angels praising God,
And saw a radiance like the morn,
The night the blessed Christ was born.

And though our ears are dull to hear,
Our hearts so slow to learn again,
The angels still are singing clear
The same song they were singing then,
Of "Peace on earth, good will to men."

TO THE CHRISTIAN PEOPLE OF AMERICA: SAVE THE RUSSIAN CHILDREN.

American Relief Administration,

Herbert Hoover, Chairman.

42 Broadway, New York City, Dec. 2, 1921.

Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City:

Dear Dr. Macfarland:

I have received the following cablegram from Colonel Haskell today:

"Notwithstanding gigantic American Relief operations already under way, millions of Christian people in Russia face certain death by starvation before 1922 harvest unless material outside assistance is forthcoming. Even now the daily mortality is great, and it will rapidly increase as winter advances. Any charity that can be given will be so distributed that the maximum number of human lives will be saved. The Russian peasant, surrounded by his family, calmly contemplates the inevitable while cherishing the vague idea that America may yet find the way to save them."

I do not know that there is anything I could add to this beyond the urgent hope that our people will feel able to provide something for the Russian people after taking into full account the increased obligations we have at home during the forthcoming winter.

Faithfully yours,

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mataxakis Elected Greek Patriarch.

The Most Rev. Archbishop Meletosi Mataxakis, whose election as Patriarch of the Greek Orthodox Church in Constantinople took place on December 8, was elected by an overwhelming majority. He has been in America for some time.

A supporter of former Premier Venizelos, Archbishop Mataxakis was formerly a candidate for election as Bishop of Athens. His election, it is understood here, signifies a rupture in relations between the Constantinople Patriarchate and the Athens Government.

His election was preceded by a heated debate in the Holy Synod, during which acting Patriarch Nicholas sharply criticized the Athens Government for failing in its duty toward the unredeemed Greeks. A large body of inter-allied and Turkish police was called to keep order in the crowd which received the announcement of Archbishop Mataxakis' election with immense enthusiasm.

A subsequent report states that the Greek Government announces its intention not to recognize the Most Rev. Meletois Mataxakis, the newly elected Patriarch of the Greek Orthodox Church in Constantinople. It also announces the breaking off of relations with the patriarchate in the belief that the patriarchs of Jerusalem, Alexandra and Atioch, and the metropolitans in the newly annexed territory, will do likewise.

A Warning.

Another imposter sociliting funds for the alleged relief of Christian victims of Turkish atrocities has been exposed.

Recently a man, claiming to be a native of Mesopotamia and a representative of an Eastern Bishop, appeared at the Church Missions House, asking aid and requesting an interview with Bishop Gailor. As it had come to the knowledge of the Foreign-Born Americans Division that a man answering this description was approaching clergy and was under suspicion, his credentials were demanded and carefully inspected. He displayed a letter purporting to be signed by "Bishop Neesan," of the "Diocese of Levania." There is no such bishop in existence and no such diocese. The letter was manifestly printed and typed on paper of American manufacture. When accused of fraud the man promptly admitted the letter was a forgery. The Police Department was promptly notified.

Attached to this fraudulent letter were commendatory letters from a score or more of prominent Episcopal, Methodist and Presbyterian clergymen in New York, Brooklyn, Boston and Philadelphia. A note-book which he carried contained a record of gifts from other prominent divines and from several noted figures in the financial world.

The Foreign-Born Americans Division will investigate all such cases if given an opportunity. The only way to avoid being victimized by imposters of this character is to refuse to make contributions or to give written endorsements unless the applicant's credentials have been officially investigated and certified.

Rector of St. Timothy's, Columbia, Accepts Call to Mississippi.

The Rev. Joseph R. Walker, rector of St. Timothy's Church, Columbia, for the past three and one-half years, has resigned and accepted a call to St. Stephen's Church at Indianola, Miss., and expects to take up his new duties on January 1.

Mr. Walker came to Columbia in June, 1918, direct from Sewanee, St. Timothy's being his first charge. The official list of the church contained forty names at that time, and the enrollment of the Sunday school was about forty-five. Today the number of communicants at St. Timothy's is one hundred and fifteen and the Sunday school enrollment one hundred and sixty.

Social work and work among the young people of the community have been stressed effectively during the rectorship of Mr. Walker, and the parish house activities have been especially successful. Sunday school work has been given much attention, leaders having been developed in the Church School Service League.

Bishop of Atlanta Delivers Stirring Addresses on Life Service.

Bishop Mikell visited the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Auburn, under the auspices of National Student Council, and delivered a series of addresses on the theme, "Life Service Through the Church," December 2 to 4. On Friday night he met the St. Paul's Club, the local unit of the National Student Council. On Saturday he addressed the student body at the College Assembly and that afternoon conferred with the Friendship Council of the Y. M. C. A. On Sunday morning the Bible classes of all the churches met, over three hundred strong, to hear the Bishop tell of the romance and adventure of devoting one's whole life to the service of God and man through the Church. He preached at the morning service at Holy Innocents, and that night all the churches united with the student body to fill the college chapel, where the Bishop spoke on "High-mindedness" as one of the greatest services the Church can render to the world today. Rarely has Auburn heard so strong a message delivered with such telling force. The call to the sacred ministry and to mission service, as well as to the devotion of oneself to the work of the Church, wherever one's lot may be cast, was brought home to each person in the crowds that gathered to hear him. An impression was made that must bring forth substantial results. This is one of the first conferences on Life Service that the National Student Council expects to hold in the principal colleges of the country this session.

LEXINGTON

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

Unique Way of Purchasing Dogs for Bishop Rowe.

The young people of the Sunday schools in the Diocese of Lexington have been much interested this fall in a gift of two hundred dollars which they have just sent to New York to be used for the purchase of two Alaskan dogs for Bishop Rowe. Some time ago one of the Church papers published a request from Bishop Rowe for some dogs for his winter trip, and this Diocese decided to send the money for two dogs to be named for Bishop Burton's two little grandsons, "Burton" and "Hendree." Each dog was divided up into a head, a tail, four quarters and the claws, and apportioned among the schools. In this way the two hundred dollars were easily secured and all of the children felt proud to have a part in the dogs. But when the two little boys heard what was to be done they determined to add their share, so one day the residents of Lexington witnessed one small boy dressed in a clown's suit seated on a soap-box in a wagon drawn by another small boy and bearing a placard announcing a "lawn fate" to be given at the residence of the Bishop of Lexington. The "fate" was a complete success, and the four dollars and twelve cents earned were proudly sent by the two boys to be added to the fund for the dogs and used to purchase the harness—the boys' own idea. Perhaps Bishop Rowe's own little son will some day help to drive these dogs with this very harness.

Successful Mission.

Archdeacon Webber has just concluded a most helpful mission at St. Paul's Church, Newport, the Rev. Edmund Jillson, rector. This is the second mission the Archdeacon has conducted in this parish within the last eighteen months. The church people of Newport feel that they have received a deep spiritual blessing from these services. The parish is awake and doing a splendid work.

Men's Corporate Communion: On the first Sunday in Advent a Men's Corporate Communion was held in Trinity Church, Covington the Rev. James D. Gibson, rector. It was the first service of the kind held in this part of the Diocese. But the attendance of over forty men shows that the introduction of such a service was not a useless experiment. Men from both Trinity and St. John's attended, and the Rev. Frank E. Cooley assisted the rector at the celebration.

Rectory Purchased: The vestry of Trinity Church, Covington, has recently purchased a rectory. It is a modern, seven-room house, well situated in the old residential section of the city. The purchase price was $11,500. The newly formed Rectors' Aid Society, composed of the younger women of the parish, have undertaken to pay for it, and in a few months have raised and paid over to the vestry the sum of -2,-500.

IDAHO.

Rt. Rev. F. H. Touret, D. D., Bishop.

First Meeting of the Bishop and Council.

On November 16, in the Bishop Tuttle Church House, at Boise, there took place the first meeting of the Bishop and Council of the Missionary District of Idaho. The Council was organized at the Convocation in May. Bishop Touret presided.

The principal business before the Council was the discussion of reports presented by the chairmen of the five departments of Church work—Missions, Religious Education, Social Service and Publicity. Archdeacon Stoy discussed the weak points in Idaho missions, illustrating his talk with a carefully prepared map. He spoke of the large Mormon population in all the Southeastern Idaho towns, it being about 70 per cent. in most of these places. Bishop Touret expects to get into touch with other denominations with a view to dividing up the work in small Idaho towns and eliminate duplication. Definite suggestions were made by the Department of Religious Education as to ways and means for recruiting the ministry, particularly propaganda that will appeal to parents and boys. Three fields for activity in Idaho were suggested by the chairman on Social Service, namely, railroad employees, mine employees and the various charitable and reformatory institutions. A systematic survey will be made of the State institutions before the next Convocation, with reference to the work already being done by different agencies, and with recommendations for such work as our Church might do. The Council voted that apportionments toward the Nation-Wide Campaign be kept at the same amounts for 1922 as for 1921. Definite action was taken to establish a news bureau, to be conducted by the chairman of the Department of Publicity.

Services for the colored people of the community have been started by the Church of the Ascension, Twin Falls, the Rev. Charles Glenn Baird, rector. The services are held on Sunday evenings, and at the last service twenty colored people were in attendence, which represented more than half of the entire colored population. A colored quartet has been organized to lead the singing.

OKLAHOMA.

Rt. Rev. T. P. Thurston, D. D., Bishop.

Additions to Clerical Force.

The district is very happy in welcoming to its field of endeavor the Rev. Dwight W. Graham, formerly of Waterbury, Conn., and the Rev. R. A. Hatch, whose last charge was in Ottawa, Kan. It is also delighted over the return of the Rev. John Gardner, who was compelled to leave the district on account of a severe illness, which he contracted on his journey West about eight years ago. While recuperating he was rector of St. James' Church, Providence, R. I. Mr. Gardner is now located in El Reno, and is doing a splendid community work there in connection with his parochial duties. Mr. Graham is minister in charge of Emanuel Church, Shawnee, the city which has been very recently awarded the first prize of $2,500 in the better cities contest in Oklahoma. Mr. Hatch is minister in charge of the missions in Ada and Holdenville.

Trinity Church, Tulsa.

On Sunday, November 27, Bishop Thurston re-dedicated Trinity Church in Tulsa The structure seated about. two hundred and eighty persons and has been used for fifteen years. The number of communicants in Tulsa has long since passed the one thousand mark, and for more than a year morning services have been conducted in one of the large theatres.

Work will begin immediately upon the new $300,000 church and parish house, and the church will be, no doubt, architecturally, the most perfect structure in the Southwest.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Healing Mission in Savannah.

A profound impression was made by the Rev. Henry B. Wilson, of Boonton, N. J., director of the Society of the Nazarine, in delivering his message on the revival of healing in the Church, at a three-day mission held in St. John's Church, Savannah, Ga., November 29 to Deecember 1.

For several months the rector of this parish, the Rev. William T. Dakin, has engaged in this work in a quiet way, and deciding to link his work with the Society of the Nazarine, he invited Mr. Wilson to Savannah to present the method of healing as practiced by this Society.

Very clearly and simply it was brought out in all of the sermons that our Lord's manner of healing as practiced by the early Church was the belief on which the Society of the Nazarine was founded.

Only after attendance at a former service were people invitetd to receive the laying on of hands, and an average of forty or fifty people availed themselves of this privilege at each service.

Members of St. John's Parish and others met the last afternoon and organized a guild at a conference held by Mr. Wilson, to meet weekly for prayer and intercession for the sick.

The Bishop of the Diocese attended the closing service and declared himself greatly impressed with Mr. Wilson's presentation of his subject.

A parish conference extending three days, two hours each afternoon and evening, was held at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Augusta (the Rev. H. Hobart Barber, rector), the middle of October. The program, as outlined in Bulletin No. 12, of the Presiding Bishop and Council, was followed, and many helpful and constructive suggestions were made. Both rector and members of the parish greatly enjoyed the experience. The Church Service League and the Church School Service League have been organized, as well as a Men's Club which is pledged to serve the Church in any way that it can. A Bible class meets every Sunday evening at Vespers. A mission has been opened by this parish at Bayvale, in which the men are much interested, one of them acting as superintendent.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

St. Paul's, Alexandria, to Have Free Pews.

At a meeting of the vestry of St. Paul's Church, the Rev. Percy Foster Hall, rector, on Tuesday evening, December 6, it was resolved that on and after January 1 the system of renting pews and sittings be discontinued and the church declared a free church. This step has been taken after mature consideration, for the difficulties involved were fully realized; but the vestry desires to put St. Paul's in line with the majority of Virginia churches in this respect, and to emphasize their long-cherished aim that their church shall serve in the largest way the community in which it has stood for more than a century. In commemoration of this action and as expressing its meaning, the heavy stone and iron fence immediately in front of the church will be at once removed.

Armistice Day in Clarke County.

Clarke County observed Armistice Day in Emmanuel Chapel, Boyce, the service being conducted by the rector, the Rev. B. D. Chambers, and the Rev. Giles B. Palmer, of White Post. One of the chapel's largest congregations attended, including the private, grammar and high schools of Boyce and members of the American Legion. The National Anthems were sung very heartily, and the service was first patriotic, paid tribute to the "Unknown Soldier," and then touched disarmament and peace. Major Robert T. Barbon, of Winchester, the past commander of the Virginia Department of the American Legion, made the address, and gave a very thrilling account of one commander's experience on Armistice Day in France, and raised his audience to high state of enthusiasm by his reference to the Conference for Limitation of Armament and a plea for permanent peace.

Gift to a Retiring Rector.

On November 11 the men's Bible class of Greenway Court Parish, White Post, gave a supper in honor of their retiring rector and leader of the class, the Rev. Giles B. Palmer, who on December 1 took charge of St. Stephen's Church, Westhampton, Richmond. Covers were laid for forty persons and the addresses were made by the Rev. B. D. Chambers, of Millwood, and the Hon. W. T. Lewis, of Berryville. Dr. C. O. Dearmont, as spokesman, presented to Mr. Palmer a loving cup as a token of affection and esteem from the men's Bible class.

The Huguenot Evangelical Society.

For twenty-one years the Huguenot Evangelical Society in Richmond has been supporting a pastor of the Protestant Church of France (Societe Centralo Evangelique). This church has been struggling gallantly, especially during and since the war, against enormous difficulties of all sorts. The pastor supported by the Huguenot Society is the Rev. Daniel Monod, a descendant of distinguished Huguenots, and a faithful laborer in his field at Manbenge, which was fearfully devastated by the war, so that he and his family have no parsonage to live in, it being only half built. The climate is cold and wet, and the help of all good people who are interested in sending the pure gospel to the French is earnestly solicited, in order that this good man and his wife, who do a large part of the work, may be properly sheltered during the winter. The public has little idea of how eagerly the French are receiving the gospel in many places.

Reg. L. McAll, in the "Intelligencer," says that their churches are diligently supporting their home work and Foreign Missions, "and most important of all, the vigor of French Protestantism is due to the spiritual fidelity and intellectual integrity of its leaders. While using institutional methods with great skill, they allow nothing to obscure their first aim, that of saving souls. They have fire, they preach the faith once delivered to the saints, and they are reaching the unchurched masses of the French people." In Manbenge, the services are well attended, the Sunday school has been increasing by leaps and bounds under Pastor Monod. Is not this work worthy of help? Send any contribution to Mrs. J. B. Halyburton, 1628 Park Avenue, Richmond, Va.

The Huguenot Society does not consist of descendants of Huguenot families only, and is anxious to receive new members. The dues are $1 yearly, and with the present membership they scarcely suffice to fill out the salary of Pastor Monod, small as that is.

A teachers' training class for the teachers and patrons of the Sunday schools of White Post, Boyce and Millwood has been meeting with success for the past few weeks. A topical analysis of the Old Testament, some teacher training and a question box take up the hour of the meetings, which are held twice a month in the parish hall at Boyce.

Co-operative Plan: Under an arrangement recently entered into by the vestries of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, and Weddell Memorial Church, the latter has merged with the former to the extent of calling the Rev. Dr. W. R. Bowie to be rector of the latter, and putting Rev. George W. Hurlbut on the staff of St. Paul's Church. The latter will remain in charge of Weddell Memorial Church and the Church of the Messiah at Highland Springs which points become chapels of St. Paul's Parish, but maintain their own vestry as heretofore.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Death of the Rev. C. O. Pruden.

The Rev. Clevius Orlando Pruden, rector of Chatham Episcopal Institute, Chatham, died suddenly on Friday, December 9, at the Retreat for the Sick, Richmond, aged sixty-five years. The body was taken to Chatham, where funeral services were conducted on Sunday afternoon, December 11, by the Rev. C. Braxton Bryan, D. D., of Petersburg; the Rev. Chiswell Dabney and the Rev. A. L. Kenyon. Interment was made in the Chatham Cemetery.

The Rev. C. O. Pruden was born at Pruden's Mill, Isle of Wight County, Va., on June 8, 1856, and was the son of John Thomas and Sarah Ann (Denson) Pruden. He graduated from the Virginia Theological Seminary in 1884, and was ordained deacon by Bishop Whittle and priest in 1885 by Bishop Randolph. He has been rector of Chatham Episcopal Institute since 1894, and was widely known in religious and educational circles.

The annual meeting of the congregation of the Epiphany Church, Danville, was held on the second Monday in Advent, the Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor, the rector, presiding. Mr. Taylor has only been three months at the head of the parish, and has already gained the love and confidence of the entire congregation. His inauguration of the plans suggested by the Presiding Bishop and Council was coincided in by the congregation in sympathetic co-operation, with the result that every member of the congregation, young and old, has become a working member in some phase of the parish life.

The annual meeting was well attended, and the reports made by the various organizations and the treasurer for the year 1921 to date were indicative of splendid work having been done.

The Rev. J. Cleveland Hall, D. D., rector-emeritus, was present, and spoke affectionately to the congregation of his pride in the parish and expressed his deep appreciation of the loving relationship already established between Mr. Taylor and himself. Mr. Taylor responded with equally affectionate words, as to the relation between himself and Dr. Hall from the very beginning, expressing his indebtedness to the latter and to every member of the congregation for the wonderful progress already made by the parish, which so far was but a promise of greater things to come.

The election of vestrymen followed.

The Rev. C. Braxton Bryan, D. D., has resigned the charge of Grace Church, Petersburg, after a rectorship of seventeen years, and has been elected rector-emeritus. The vestry has called the Rev. E. R. Carter, rector of St. John's Church, Hampton, to succeed Dr. Bryan.

The Rev. Herbert H. Young, A. B., B. S. and M. A. of William and Mary College, was made a member of the Phi Beta Kappa at the celebration of its one hundred and forty-fifth anniversary of the society on December 5.

The Phi Beta Kappa was founded at William and Mary in 1776, and it is a high honor to be elected a member. Mr. Young has been for the past six years rector of Cumberland Parish, Lunenburg County, and is one of the leading rural clergymen of the Diocese.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Mission services lasting a week were held at the Church of the Incarnation during the week of December 11 by the Rev. Spence Burton, of Boston, Mass. The Rev. William Tayloe Snyder, rector of the church, has arranged services to be held daily, except Saturday, at 7:30 and 10:30 A. M. and 8 o'clock P. M., and all are invited to come to these services.

A joint meeting of the Sunday School Institute and Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese was held on Tuesday, December 13, at 8 o'clock at St. John's Church. The principal speaker was the Rev. S. Harrington Littell, Secretary of the General Synod of the Chinese Holy Catholic Church. His subject was "Human and Political Problems in the Far East."

The Rev. Dr. William Sheafe Chase, of Christ Church, Brooklyn, was the preacher at the Church of the Ascension on Sunday, December 11. Canon Chase is in Washington in connection with the twenty-seventh anniversary of the International Reform Bureau, of which he is president. In this position and as chairman of the Social Service Committee of the Diocese of Long Island, he has been brought into close touch with social work and is recognized as one of the country's foremost authorities on social problems.

A special service for men was held at Epiphany Church on Sunday evening, December 11, under the auspices of the Laymen's Service Association of the Diocese. Dr. Freeman preached the sermon.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Annual Memorial Service for "The Father of His Country."

In commemoration of the death of George Washington, the First Troop, Philadelphia City Cavalry, attended service in full dress Sunday, December 11, in St. James' Church.

This was in keeping with the time-honored custom of attending a memorial service for the "Father of His Country," to whom first members of the troop served as bodyguards in the Revolution. The service is held yearly on the Sunday nearest the date of Washington's death, December 14.

The service was conducted by the rector, the Rev. Dr. John Mockridge. To give the military note, the music in part was to the accompaniment of trumpets and drums. The troop moved afoot from the armory to the church.

Anniversary of St. David's, Manayunk.

St. David's Church, Manayunk, celebrated its ninetieth anniversary, beginning Saturday evening, December 3, and continuing through Sunday. The Saturday celebration consisted of a "social evening," when the members gathered in the parish house and the Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, made the principal address. The men's chorus of Mount Zion Methodist Episcopal Church rendered a musical program.

Two historical addresses were delivered on Sunday.

St. David's Parish was founded by the Rev. Robert Davis, of Reading, when Manayunk was a village, having no connection with Philadelphia. The cornerstone was laid in 1852. St. Alban's, Roxborough; St. Stephen's, Wissahickon, and St. Timothy's Roxborough, were at one time mission chapels of St. David's.

The Rev. Francis B. Barnett is the rector.

Installation Services: The two Bishops of the Diocese officiated Sunday, December 4, at two installation services in suburban churches. Bishop Rhinelander officiated at the institution of the Rev. Benjamin N. Bird as rector of St. Asaph's, Bala, succeeding the Rev. Harrison B. Wright. Bishop Garland took part in the institution of the Rev. Andrew Haughey as rector of St. Mary's, Ardmore. Mr. Haughey had been assistant at St. Mary's and was chosen rector after the death of Rev. George P. Allen.

A baptismal font has been presented to All Saints' Church, one of the older parishes in Philadelphia, by Congressman William S. Vare, in memory of his daughter, Miss Ida May Vare, who died in China a year ago while accompanying her father and a Congressional party on a tour of the Far East. She was baptized and confirmed in All Saints' Church.

The font is of carved and polished white Vermont marble, and a basin two feet deep rests in pillars.

The Church of St. John the Baptist, Germantown, has purchased the house at 5313 Wakefield Street for a rectory.

R. R. W.

St. Andrew's Chapel, McKinley, entered the new Church year and its Natal Day—St. Andrew's Day—in good shape. Bishop Suffragan Garland came for confirmation on St. Andrew's Day, the second class this year, and the people of the chapel have added many improvements to the chapel, which will help considerably in furthering the work this winter.

Miss M. B. Sibman, one of the Church's missionaries located in Wuchang, China, addressed the congregation at St. Andrew's Chapel, McKinley, Pa., on the evening of the First Sunday in Advent. Miss Sibman's story was most interesting and was listened to attentively, and steps were immediately taken to put into a tangible shape an expression of appreciation for the work she is doing.

The men's Bible class at the Church of Our Saviour, Jenkintown, is holding the interest of more than the number of men whom it was originally expected to reach—namely, fifty. At the session on the first Sunday morning in Advent sixty-four laymen were in attendance. Seventy-nine men of the church attended the Corporate Communion on the morning of the first Sunday in Advent, following the suggestion of the national office of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew for a Corporate Communion on this morning throughout the Church.

LOS ANGELES.

Rt. Rev. Joseph H. Johnson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. B. Stevens, Ph. D., Coadjutor.

Tribute Paid Bishop Johnson by Citizens of Pasadena.

Completion by the Rt. Rev. Joseph H. Johnson, D. D., of more than a quarter of a century as Bishop of Los Angeles and as a resident of Pasadena, was marked by a "community banquet," tendered by the people of Pasadena to the Bishop and Mrs. Johnson at the Hotel Maryland on Thursday evening, December 1. The dinner, which was attended by three hundred and fifty men and women, representing many walks of life and all faiths and creeds, was an expression of esteem and affection from the people to a religious leader, educator, upbuilder and loyal Pasadena citizen beloved for his democracy of heart and catholicity of mind, and to his charming wife.

The opening prayer, which was one of thanks for the safe return of the Bishop and Mrs. Johnson from an extended trip abroad, was said by the Rev. Richard W. Abberley, D. D., pastor of the Central Christian Church. The Rev. Leslie E. Learned, D. D., rector of All Saints' Church, was master of ceremonies, and greetings and expressions of appreciation from the people of various denominations were brought by Judge Edwin F. Hahn, for the First Congregational Church; Mr. Frank S. Wallace, for the Methodist Church; Mr. L. A. Broadway, for the Baptist Church, and the Rev. Robert Freeman, D. D., for the Presbyterian Church.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop.

Dr. Birckhead Captures Delaware Churchmen.

At the semi-annual dinner of the Delaware Church Club held December 7 in the du Pont Hotel, Wilmington, Dr. Hugh Birckhead, rector of Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, told the story of the visit made by him to the Holy Land last summer in company with a Jewish rabbi. As he unfolded the significance of the land as the birthplace of our religion, and then related the attempt of the Kaiser to prepare the way, by a great world war, for his triumphal entry into the Holy Land, the listeners learned as never before the meaning of the present humiliation whih has overtaken the once-powerful war lord.

The vexed situation of the Jews since the war was also described by Dr. Birckhead, who narrated the events which have followed the signing of a compact between the British Cabinet and a Jewish chemist whereby England became possessor of a more powerful gas than that with which Germany seemed to be on the point of bringing the world to her feet. England has found difficulty in fulfilling the compact in the way in which many Jews understood it, and America is appealed to for one hundred million dollars with which to finance the movement for the return of the Jews to their ancient land, and to relieve the distress arising from the migration of thousands to a land unprepared for their return.

Bishop Cook also addressed the club and declared the time is ripe for a drive for ten thousand communicants in the Diocese.

Collect for Fourth Sunday in Advent.

O Lord, raise up, we pray Thee, Thy power, and come among us, and with great might succor us; that whereas, through our sins and wickedness, we are sore let and hindered in running the race that is set before us, Thy bountiful grace and mercy may speedily help and deliver us; through the satisfaction of Thy Son our Lord, to Whom, with Thee and the Holy Ghost, be honor and glory, world without end. Amen.

Collect for St. Thomas' Day.

Almighty and ever-living God, Who, for the greater confirmation of the faith, didst suffer Thy holy Apostle Thomas to be doubtful in Thy Son's resurrection, Grant us so perfectly, and without all doubt, to believe in Thy Son Jesus Christ, that our faith in Thy sight may never be reproved. Hear us, O Lord, through the same Jesus Christ, to whom, with Thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honor and glory, now and forevermore. Amen.

The Gift.

(To H. B. C.)

Anna B. Bensel.

'Tis Christmas! and you, too, have sung the glory
Of Him Who came to earth so long ago
For that great sacrifice—the Victim holy—
Binding upon Himself our human woe.

He gave to you a gift, in gracious loving,
Unknown to you, within your heart it lay,
Until He touched your eyes, revealing softly
The undreamed blessing, on that wakened day.

And you shall find the secret of its comfort,
Which makes the spirit grow full sweet and broad.
It is so restful, friend, to sing—when weary—
Leaning your soul against the heart of God!

The Last Name.

Jesus! That was the name written at first below every other name, at the very end of the list of the Roman officers charged with the duty of the census of the district about Bethlehem. All day long the tired pilgrims have filed before the desk. At last the wearying record is complete, and the officer sets himself to cast up the column. A shadow falls across the page; he turns impatiently to the doorway, to see the figure of a stalwart man outlined against the setting sun.

"I could not came earlier," says the man—"the child was born last night."

"You are at the inn"

"No, we arrived too late, the babe was born in a manger!"

"Your name?"

"Joseph."

"Of what tribe?"

"Of Benjamin, of the house of David. We are the descendants of kings!" The officer did not even look up. The world was full of descendants of former kings. And now there was no king but Caesar, whose name was above every name.

"Your wife's name?"

"Mary."

"And the child's name is to be?"

"JESUS!" The voice of the man fondles the syllables. "It means the Saviour of His people."

"Jesus, son of Joseph, of the tribe of Benjamin," wrote the officer, and closed the book. It was the last name on the list.

And so it goes—some write His name after ambitions and pleasures and selfishness, but "God hath exalteth Him and given Him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow" in heaven, and every knee of principalities and powers, and thrones and dominions, and angels and arch-angels, and seraphim and cherubim, and martyrs and saints; and every soul in Paradise; and the very demons in hell; and over all the earth at Christmas week knees bow, and tongues confess anew on the Feast of the Nativity, that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. The whole world is in love with Him. As a baby creeps across the floor to bend and kiss a bar of sunlight falling into the room, so the whole world loves the sunshine of the love of God in the face, and life, and words of Jesus Christ.

In Cannaught, Ireland, white candles will burn in every house before the family altar and the door will be left open that Mary may know the door would not be closed, if she came again this Christmas with the Holy Child. In Lyons, France, at the Foundling Hospital, the first infant on Christmas day will be accorded a royal welcome, in His name. In Naples and Rome the pifferari will come down from the mountains to play in front of all the carpenters' shops in honor of Jesus. In Armenia each household will gather round while candles are lighted and father tells the story; as the candles burn out and the story closes, the feast will begin, while salutations will go joyfully round, "The Gracious Birth of Christ, blessed by His birth!"—Rev. G. C. Stewart.

Children Are Not "Naturally Cruel."

It is a very general belief that children are naturally cruel, and one frequently hears such phrases as "the cruelty of childhood," or "all children are cruel, but they outgrow it," as if cruelty were like helplessness, or simplicity, an attribute of childhood, inseparable from the state of infancy.

A cruel nature, of course, shows itself such in infancy, as a generous one will show generosity, or a lazy one indolence; but, cruelty in itself, that is, enjoyment in causing or witnessing suffering, is not a characteristic of childhood.

The baby who plays with a kitten, holding it up by its tail, or clutching its fur, crowing with delight at the little creature's cries of pain, is not cruel, because it has no idea that it is inflicting pain.

Even the older child who chases the butterfly, crushing it to death in a hot little hand, is not cruel, for he also is too ignorant to know what suffering he has caused.

The child that is suffered, unchecked, to torture an animal, will soon pass from an unconscious to a conscious cruelty; from careless infliction of pain to enjoying the sight of suffering; from the torture of animals to the hurting of smaller brothers and sisters.

But kindness must be taught. Weeds only are self-sown; we need but leave the garden uncared for, and before long we find it overgrown with weeds. But we must sow and plant and tend with ceaseless care, if we would have our garden filled with sweet flowers and fruit.—The Humanitarian.

The Stars in Glory Shine!

Martha A. Kidder.

The stars in glory shine,
The angels sing
To greet their King,
And guard the Child divine.

The mother is asleep,
The Babe at rest,
Upon her breast,
The ages watch shall keep.

Proclaim with mighty voice
The Son of God has come
From His eternal home,
Rejoice again, rejoice!

The Chaplain's Christmas.

To the villagers of the little town of Loupeland we must have been a weird procession when early on Christmas morning we found our way in the darkness along the winding road which formed the main street of their town. The three or four lighted candles which we carried cast strange shadows on the pavement and the white pages of our Christmas carols showed plainly against our uniforms.

Only an occasional home showed signs of life. Few families had risen, for the presents of this Christmas would be simple and inexpensive; in some homes there would be none at all. Four years of war had impoverished Loupeland. What was the need of rising early? Let the children sleep; the day would be long enough. Passing homes where such thoughts as these ruled, we hurried on to the village square, where the dim outlines of the parish church could be just detected.

Some one inquired the time. As we mounted the steps of the church the old clock in the tower answered the question, striking six. It was still quite dark; the time of day when everything is indistinct and nothing is seen in its correct proportion. Peculiar emotions came to us as we stood in the shadow of the house of God waiting for the chimes to cease. We wondered how the day would begin for our dear ones in the States. Our thoughts stole back to previous Yuletides, when we had enjoyed so much of the Christmas cheer in our own homes. But we had not come to meditate. We had come to sing our Christmas carols to the villagers. As the echoes of the chimes resounded through the church we sang—

"Joy to the world, the Lord is come!
Let earth receive her King.
Let every heart prepare Him room,
And heaven and nature sing."

With this stirring hymn we began our joyous mission. Should not this be indeed a joyous Christmas? Had not the Prince of Peace, the Christmas Christ, demonstrated His power and His rule once more? For the first time in almost half a decade France was to obesrve her Noel with light heart. We were determined to do our part by giving the day a memorable beginning.

Then followed, "Oh, little town of Bethlehem," and as we sang this much-loved hymn of Bishop Brooks it was filled with a new meaning. For Bethlehem seemed nearer with the quaint, old-fashioned cottages of Loupeland stretching out before us. Other of the well-known Christmas hymns followed: "It Came Upon the Midnight Clear," and "Hark! the Herald Angels Sing." When we turned to "Silent Night, Holy Night," and sang of the calm and of the brightness "round yon Virgin Mother and Child," some of us thought of the dear little tots that had come into our homes and a few of us thought of our blessed babies in heaven, now the companions of the "Holy Infant so tender and mild."

As we continued to sing, one by one the lights began to appear in the homes across the square. Here and there a figure was seen in a doorway; an occasional greeting came to us. The village was beginning to awaken. So we moved out across the square to the street and went slowly from one end of the little city to the other, singing our carols as we went. When we were ready to return to our quarters it was nearly seven o'clock, and by that time the whole of Loupeland had risen. Some of the fathers came out to thank us, many of the mothers cried out their Christmas greeting from the open doors, and the little children pressed their faces against the windows, having heard but wondering at the strange songs.

Thus the Christmas that we had looked forward to with no little dread began in a way designed to give the entire day a wholesome tone. We had sung ur Christmas carols to an alien people in a tongue foreign to them, but the universal Christ had led us to one another and in the joy of a peaceful Christmas we entered upon the celebration of the Master's birthday with light hearts. When we returned to the chateau where we were quartered there was time enough before breakfast for a reading of the Christmas story, a solo by one of the chaplains, and a fervent, helpful prayer.

There were about forty of the A. E. F. chaplains at the Army Chaplains' School on Christmas. You have just read the way in which the day was begun by some of us. The afternoon was worthy of the morning. As the day drew to a close we learned that the celebration of our Lord's birthday is not dependent upon location or conditions. It is largely a matter of the heart.

It was decided by a committee previously appointed that it would be a fitting thing to give the little folk of Loupeland a typical American Christmas. Acting upon this decision, a tree was secured and duly decorated, having been placed in the spacious parlor of the roomy old chateau. Great boughs of brilliant holly with the bright red berries peeping out were hung in rich profusion throughout the lower rooms of the chateau. About one hundred presents were purchased in the city of Le Mans, and to these were added the same number of good-sized boxes of candy liberally donated by the Red Cross. Eagerly we worked to make the event memorable. We were rather well pleased with the result of our efforts.

As early as two o'clock the older children who could not wait for the automobiles which the commandant of the school had provided, began to file into the grounds of the chateau, and, to our surprise, accompanied by mothers and aunts and older sisters. It was seen at once that our big parlor would not begin to hold the number who had decided to accept our invitation. But the crowded condition of the parlor and the wide-spreading hall did not detract one whit from the enjoyment of the afternoon.

There was an address of welcome delivered, slowly, by one of the chaplains who had mastered French. Then followed a program happily rendered and eagerly listened to. Perhaps the number which elicited most applause was a song with banjo accompaniment. The children went wild over the banjo. When our part had ended the children sang the Marsellaise at our request. I doubt if the same number of American children could sing the Star Spangled Banner any more vigorously.

The presents and the candy were the crowning events of the afternoon. I was standing where I could watch most of the children. One boy with a front tooth missing and freckles that looked as though a hot Iowa sun had developed them, scarcely took his eye off the tree. He had discovered a drum, and that drum he would have, and, I hasten to add, that drum he got. A little motherly soul of ten told me that her father had been killed in the war and that her mother had since died. She had a younger sister and two younger brothers. Her maternal powers were greatly taxed as she tried to keep these three under her wing after they received their candy and presents. When the youngsters had passed by the tree and had been given their gifts they assembled in front of the chateau, waiting for the machines that were to take them to their homes. As we watched the boys cock their toy guns and the girls caress their new dolls we knew that our Christmas had been a success. We also remembered that in bringing joy into the hearts of these, His least, we had brought joy unto Him.—Chapalin G. W. Brown, in Presbyterian Banner.

The Depth of Prayer.

There are in a certain part of the country a few miles inland great ponds, almost lakes of water. It was long noticed that independent of the rainfall, the level of these ponds was different at different parts of the day and year. It was found that when one pond was highest, there was a marked tendency for all the ponds to rise too; some responded quicker than others; all of them rose within a few hours after one another as the biggest pond rose. Yet there was no apparent connection between the ponds. People, by observing, came to the conclusion that there must be a subterranean connection of some kind between the ponds. But why should any one of them rise. People came at last to the conclusion that one of them at least must have a subterranean connection with the tides of the sea.

So to all appearances, when you retire into your own mind and think your own thoughts you are absolutely alone and isolated from all the rest of us. Yet it is a fact that no great invention or discovery has ever been made, in any live human mind, but it was found that in several other minds the discovery was almost or altogether achieved about the same time. Beliefs, like belief in witchcraft or the belief in the necessity of slavery, rise and fall by communities rather than by individuals. Somehow there is a certain depth in the unconscious deeps of your nature where you and I are one. And that ocean in which we all are perfectly one is the ocean of the love and power of God.

There is nothing magic about prayer. It is simply a half undiscovered law of the connection of the human mind with other human minds and with the great mind of God, in whom we all live and move and have our being.

If together, now, you and I were to agree that we would put ourselves into prayers, in the future; were to imagine ourselves in living touch with God, thanking Him for the vision and its certain realization; if we then were to pause for a moment, that God might speak His word to us and start us with resolution on this upward path, then we would all have taken one of our early steps on that way which at last leads to the point where our Saviour kneels in joyful communion with His heavenly Father.—J. Edgar Park.

Love's Miracle.

Come, shepherds, come to Bethlehem,
To greet the new-born Day!
The rose-lit morning dims the stars,
And all their bright array.
But fairer than the hosts of heaven
Or flowers the spring may know,
Roses have out of Eden bloomed,
And summer in the snow.

The morning stars have sung for joy,
The angels meet them there,
What rush of holy voices fills
The stilly listening air!
These frozen banks are flushed with flowers,
At midnight comes our morn,
Our Saviour comes to dwell with us,
Jesus Christ is born!

Child Jesus lies in Mary's arms,
So sweet, so soft, so small;
He smiles on her, His mother dear,
On oxen in the stall:
When love like this comes down from heaven,
To praise Him haste away!—
Come, shepherds, come to greet Him there,
To hail the King of Day!

Once a Year.

I do not believe the old saying that Christmas comes but once a year. To the selfish world, busy with its own affairs and greedy for its own gain, I doubt if the real Christmas ever comes. To others the spirit of good will, of generous giving, of kindly service, may come for a day when they are reminded by the holly and the mistletoe. But to him who wears upon his breast the badge of the loving heart, who gains by giving, who is happy in another's happiness, who finds his daily task a service and the world his friend—to him Christmas Day is every day, and living is but loving.—Selected.

A Child's Christmas Hymn.

Jesse Jouitte.

'Tis Christmas-tide, dear Jesus;
The time of Thy dear birth—
At early dawn, on Christmas morn
Thou camest to bless the earth.

Thy lovely mother, Mary,
Watched o'er Thy lowly bower;
The birds were sleeping in their nests;
Asleep the wayside flower.

The shepherds, as they watched, beheld
A great light in the sky—
And then they heard the angels tell
Their message from on high.

"To you, this day a Saviour,
In Bethlehem is born."
And then they said, "Good will to man;
And peace." 'Twas Christmas morn.

The shepherd sought Thy presence
To glorify Thy name,
And let us not forget, dear Lord,
This day to do the same.

This Christmas-tide, dear Jesus,
In memory of Thy birth,
Let us bring gladness to some heart,
To help Thee bless the earth.

How Santa Claus Came.

Priscilla's grandfather was an instructor in a State university; that shows that he was a learned man. He was called "Professor." Once the President of the United States invited him to come visiting at the White House in Washington, because he knew so much about the stars and everything in the sky. He called the stars by name, and you would think he had once lived in the Milky Way, he could tell you so much about it. Great men from all over the world came to call on Priscilla's grandfather, and he talked with them all as easily as Priscilla talked with Tommie Perkins through the back fence at home. Wise men from everywhere seemed to think that there was nothing about the sun, moon and stars and all the heavenly hosts that Priscilla's grandfather didn't know; and yet Priscilla was deeply disappointed in this wonderful man, because she, seven-year-old Priscilla, had discovered that he didn't know it all.

Here it was, Christmas Eve, and he had said nothing about the Star in the East, about the angels who came winging their way to earth to sing on the hills of Judea, because a Babe was born in Bethlehem; he had not even mentioned Santa Claus and flying reindeer on this most wonderful night of the year. There had been plenty of chance, too, because Priscilla and her dignified white-haired grandfather had dined alone. It had been a long and dreary meal, too, with the colored boy who waited on table in a hurry to have it over with, because he and the other servants had been given a holiday for the evening. The housekeeper had gone home in the afternoon to make merry with her beautiful grandchildren. She wished to take Priscilla with her, but grandfather had said no, it might be necessary for him to take the little girl to the hospital before the dawn.

The housekeeper understood, and tears came in her eyes as she kissed the little girl and said to her that they would see next day what could be done about Christmas.

Priscilla didn't understand. She knew that her mother had been taken suddenly ill with appendicitis and that she had been taken to the University Hospital, and she knew that her father, who was once grandfather's little boy in this same big house, long years before grandma died, had gone to the hospital to stay all night; he had brought her to grandfather's house and left her in his care. Mother had said at the last, "Be a good little girl, my darling," and father had said, "Be a brave little girl and obey your grandfather." That was all; not a word about Christmas Eve.

They might have known that Priscilla would be a good little girl just before Christmas, anyway. They might have known, too, that Priscilla would be good for the sake of her mother, although the little girl didn't know the meaning of appendicitis; it was a new word to her.

It seemed strange, though, that they had all forgotten the meaning of Christmas Eve to a little child—all of them but the housekeeper. It was bad enough to be away from home on Christmas Eve, separated from her father and mother, without even a mention of Santa Claus. Worst of all, Priscilla had heard her grandfather tell the nurse at the hospital, speaking over the telephone, that he would sit up all night and wait for news. Now it is well known that Santa Claus does not care to meet the man of the house, up and dressed at midnight, when he comes down the chimney on Christmas Eve; and how could he come down the chimney if there should be a fire in the grate? Priscilla hoped that if her grandfather did sit up all night he would stay in his study and let the fire go out in the living-room.

She went to bed at eight o'clock. She said her prayers at grandpa's knee and he didn't seem to listen to a word she said when she prayed for gifts to take to little sick children in the hospital and besought our Lord to take good care of her mother and send her home quickly "all cured." At last, just as grandfather had covered her with too many blankets and was leaving the room, Priscilla called after him—

"O grandpa, don't you suppose Santa Claus will know I am here and come down your chimney tonight?"

Grandfather didn't smile as he answered thoughtlessly: "Well, if he does, I'll have a good look at him. Good-night, Priscilla. Go to sleep like a good little girl."

Priscilla couldn't go to sleep; she kept thinking of her dear mother and her father, and their beautiful Christmases at home, until she was so lonely and homesick it is no wonder that she cried and cried into her pillow. Suddenly the little girl remembered that this strange night, for the first time in her life, she had forgotten to hang up her stocking! She wondered how she could have been so careless; she must hang her stocking at once.

Priscilla slipped out of bed and by the light in the hall found her stockings. A minute later her grandfather, who was sitting in front of the fireplace in the big living-room, saw a little girl in her nightie coming softly toward him. He was sitting in a huge chair in front of a roaring fire, with the tips of his fingers together. It was strange to see grandfather sitting like that and doing nothing.

"What is the trouble, Priscilla?" he inquired.

"I—I forgot to hang my stockings," she answered.

"Why, that is right," he said; "hang them here by the fire so they will be nice and warm in the morning. You may dress yourself right here on this rug—good idea!"

"Oh, but I am thinking of Santa Claus," wailed the child. "I—I'm afraid he won't come down this chimney with such a fire burning!"

"If he does I'll make him unload his whole pack," grandpa answered. "I'd forgotten about him." Then he helped Priscilla hang both stockings, but he spoke and acted like a man in a dream, because he was thinking of appendicitis instead of why children hang stockings by the fireplace on Christmas Eve. He carried Priscilla back to bed, and this time he kissed her good-night and said, "Don't worry, little one; don't worry"; and back he went to the fire to worry and worry because he couldn't help it.

Priscilla, though, feeling comforted, fell asleep, thinking one minute that angels were in the room and that she heard the rustle of their wings, and feeling sure the next minute that she heard the bells of fleeting reindeer in the air outside.

Suddenly Priscilla was awakened by the distinct ringing of the front door-bell. She sat straight up in bed and listened; the few minutes she had been asleep seemed hours. She heard grandfather walk down the long hall. He opened the front door. No one spoke. Grandfather closed the door after a minute of silence and started back to the living-room. Opposite Priscilla's door he paused.

"Who was it?" she inquired.

"There was no one at the door," he answered; "no one in sight."

"Then it was Santa Claus!" the child exclaimed. "He cannot come down the chimney, so he came to the door and gave just one ring. Next time he does it, grandpa, do please go faster and let him in."

"I certainly shall," grandpa promised. "Now cuddle down and go to sleep again."

Priscilla tried to keep awake that time to see what would happen next, but she couldn't do it.

Grandpa, however, was wide awake, and now he had something to think of besides about Priscilla's mother at the hospital, whose life was hanging by a thread, as the surgeon explained; an operation might save her, but there was little hope. What interested Priscilla's grandfather was this: a light blanket of snow had fallen in that Southern city and covered the front porch, yet, although the old-fashioned bell had sent one clear peal through the house, there was not a sign of a footprint on the snow. Grandfather was mystified.

Perhaps an hour later the bell rang again. Grandfather hastened to the door, with Priscilla shivering with cold and excitement close behind him. The window was open in her room, and the night was chilly.

"Run back, child; run back," cautioned grandfather. He opened the door; there was no one there and not a track in the snow.

"It was Santa Claus; I know it; I know it!" the little girl exclaimed. "It is just like him to come to every house in the world where there is a child like me that'll divide everything with poor children! You'll see, grandfather, that before morning Santa Claus will get in this house somehow and leave me two stockings full of gifts and things for poor children besides. Now I am going to cover up my ears and sleep so I can wake up early in the morning. Good-night, grandpa dear. Merry Christmas!"

After the man went back to the fire she called again in shrill, glad tones, "Merry Christmas, Merry Christmas, grandpa, to all the world, and to every one in our family—good-night." After that there was no more heard from Priscilla until grandpa awakened her in the Christmas dawn.

Meantime perhaps another hour passed and the bell rang again! No one was there; there were no tracks in the snow. Another interval of time, the bell rang again! No one there; no tracks in the snow.

At last grandfather began to think seriously of Santa Claus, and suddenly he realized how blind they had all been because of the shadow hanging over their Christmas Eve. But a child must not suffer, too; not if he could help it. No child in grandfather's house had ever before faced a cheerless Christmas morning. When grandfather had come fully to his senses, he walked to the telephone and talked with two leading merchants of that town and told them to send to the side entrance of his house the finest gifts and books in their shops suitable for a seven-year-old girl, and a general assortment of toys for "poor children"—and "never mind the expense"!

All night at intervals the front door-bell kept ringing fainter and fainter at last, until in the early hours of Christmas morning it was but a tinkle; still there were no tracks in the snow.

At dawn, though, the latch-key turned in the door and a hasty step sounded in the hall. Grandpa sprang to his feet, and there stood his own son, Priscilla's father. His face was beaming with joy.

"Merry Christmas!" was his greeting. "The best of news!" Priscilla's father exclaimed. "She is living; she will live. The operation was successful—there is every chance for her recovery! But, father, we forgot all about our poor little tad's Christmas stockings, and"—

"Old Santa Claus didn't," grandpa interrupted, and waved his hand toward the fireplace, where two stockings bulged with mysteries, and gifts were piled high up on the floor. "No, sir, Santa Claus didn't forget—you may depend on that old fellow every time! No, you mustn't go for that baby; your clothes are too cold! Let me!"

And he went. "Merry Christmas, Priscilla!" he called, as he snatched her, blankets and all, from her bed, to carry her, winking and blinking and rubbing her eyes, into the warm, bright living-room.

"Oh, Merry Christmas to all the world!" she shouted when she saw those stockings. "He came; he came! I knew he'd come! Is mother getting well this lovely Christmas morning?" she asked her father, before she touched a gift.

"Mother is getting well!" father answered, and then he danced around the living-room, and behaved the way Tommy Perkins did when his side beat at a ball game! Oh, but those three had a gay time. The housekeeper could scarcely believe her eyes and her ears when she came in to get breakfast.

After breakfast Priscilla's father and grandfather made a secret examination of the front door-bell. They found that a huge spider had spun a thick web, for reasons of her own they could not understand, around and around the inside of that old-fashioned door-bell. It was the kind of bell that worked by the turning of a knob. When the spider stepped on the slender spring of the bell, down it went with the weight of her heavy body; when she stepped off, "Ding!" said the bell. The two men had a merry laugh, but they didn't tell Priscilla just then what amused them so much.

And at the hospital that day a radiant child said to her mother in the minute in which she was allowed to say anything:

"Oh, mother dear, Santa Claus played a big joke on grandpa! And you ought to see my presents! We have brought a bushel basket full to give to children in the hospital! I never had so many to divide before in my life! Merry Christmas to everybody in the world; and most of all to mothers and children in hospitals!"

And that's all for now.—F. M. Fox, in Presbyterian Banner.

Winter.

Winter, which is the season for which city dwellers most often commiserate those who live in the country, is both more enjoyable and more widely enjoyed in the country than in the city. There the snow lies clean for weeks, a mantle that not only warms the things that the farmer knows should be kept warm, but also hides much that would be unsightly if left exposed. The landscape itself changes.

When the leaves have fallen from the deciduous trees the conifers come into unaccustomed prominene, and new vistas open in the woods. The very sounds are those of creatures that go about their business undisturbed by the seasons—the calling of crows and blue jays, the barking of dogs, the voices of cattle; and in the clear cold of a Northern winter they have a wonderful carrying quality and something of music.

As to winter sports, they are all country born and bred. Coasting down an artificial chute on a toboggan is tame when compared with skimming half a mile of snow-crusted pasture full of boulders and hidden brush heaps, and skating in a rink is like eating canned mushrooms or desiccated apples. The place to skate is out of doors on a river where you can stretch away for miles and see something new at every turn, or on a lake, or, best of all, in flooded woods, where you can glide into a thousand icy estuaries sheltered from the wind and cut shinny sticks that Nature herself made in her own factory and build a roaring camp fire round which to gather in the dusk.

The city man pities his country cousin because he has to get up in a cold room and start the fire and draw water from the well. His idea of living is to open the draft of the furnace, hop back into bed and get up when the house has got warm. The poor fellow does not know that the exercise of building the fire and drawing the water and doing the other morning chores would warm him more quickly and more thoroughly, and with that eternal, self-engendered heat which bestows a comfort greater than anything which a stove or a furnace radiates. The ordinary country dweller probably sits down to his breakfast with a sense of physical well-being and contentment that the city man seldom has.

No; winter is nothing for which we who know it ask to be commiserated. It is virile, tonic, wholesome. Let those who wish seek the soft allurements of the pomegranate and the palm. We prefer our annual bout with the vigorous old chap whose hair is as snow and his beard as icicles, but who still packs a wonderful wallop in his hard old fist.—Youth's Companion.

The Land of Christmas.

Once upon a time there was a poor little lame boy who had no toys. Tom knew this was true, for one day, at the little boy's house, Tom asked him to bring out his toys, and the little boy answered, "I haven't any toys."

Tom could hardly believe that there was anybody in the world without even one toy, so he went home and told little sister about it, and together they planned to bring the little boy a toy from the beautiful Land of Christmas.

Mother was willing for them to go, so hand in hand on the day before Christmas went Tom and little sister. They did not know the way, so they asked a feathery snowflake which came and lighted saucily on the end of Tom's finger:

"Pretty snowflake, while you linger
On the tip of my warm finger,
Tell me, where's the Land of Christmas?"

And it answered, oh, so softly:

"Little boy and girl, politely
Ask yon tree that shines so brightly
If you seek the Land of Christmas."

The children continued their journey, and at last they arrived at the great tree, all shining brightly across the white snow. When the children asked the way to Christmas Land, thus the shining tree responded:

"Step into my trunk so hollow,
Take a Magic Wand, and follow,
The Shining Path to Christmas Land."

So they stepped into the hollow trunk, where they found magic wands. Tom chose a silver wand with a star at the end of it, and little sister a golden one, with a white dove at its end.

When the children stepped out of the tree they were surprised to find themselves grow very small, indeed. And this they noticed—if the magic wands were held aloft, the children remained small, but if the wands were lowered, the children grew large again.

The children knew that in the Land of Magic they must obey all the great commands, so they started down the Shining Path, holding their magic wands high in the air. They journeyed on and on and at last they reached a great wall, and when they looked up they saw beautiful lights which spelled the words "Christmas Land" over the tiny gateway!

Tom reached up and pulled the bell rope, and out upon the frosty air rang the sweetest chimes you ever heard. Soon the tiny gates opened and Tom and little sister were glad that they were small enough to slip through! And oh, such a beautiful land as it was! Every tree was a Christmas tree all laden with Christmas gifts. The music boxes were playing, the horns were tooting, the dolls were saying "mamma" and "papa," the Jacks-in-the-box were jumping out and then hiding again, and everything seemed to be saying, "Take me! Take me!" It was hard for the children to select just one toy for their little friend.

They skipped about for a long time, examining the toys. Finally, on the top branch of one of the tallest trees there hung a box tied with a big red bow. On one side were printed the words, "Magic Lantern."

"The very thing!" said Tom, but how could he bring down the box from the top of a tree so tall—for, as you remember, the children were very small. Just then a little breeze whispered in Tom's ear:

"Little fairies, tell me why
I see you sit so still and sigh;
I will get the box for you!"

Then the little breeze blew into a strong breeze and flew into the top of the tree. There he tugged and pulled and puffed, until at last the string had to let go and down fell the box, red bow and all, into a soft bank of snow. The children were overjoyed when the box containing the magic lantern was safe in their hands!

Then they went back along the Shining Path, and very soon reached the great Shining Tree. Into its hollow trunk they went, and left the magic wands, and as soon as they stepped out into the daylight again they found themselves as large as ever. They ran on and on, until they finally reached the little boy's window. The setting sun was painting everything red and orange and gold, and when they peeped in there lay the poor boy on his little cot, and his empty stocking hung from the back of a chair.

The chair stood near the window, and on the note that was pinned to the stocking Tom read the words, "Dear Santa Claus: If you should happen to have just one toy to spare for me, won't you please leave me a magic lantern?"

Tom softly opened the window and placed the box with its precious toy on the chair near the empty stocking. Then the children slipped away to their home, where they told mother their secret.

And all would have gone well if the lantern had not been a magic lantern, for in some way it had taken a picture of Tom and another of little sister. So the next morning the happy little boy sat in his chair opposite the screen which his poor, hard-working mother had put up. Together they watched eagerly for the first picture.

And would you believe it, that tell-tale machine showed, first, Tom's smiling fame, and then little sister's dimpled one!—Presbyterian of the South.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

A Successful Campaign.

St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, at the Sunday evening service, November 20, completed a parish campaign that, in its awakening and successful effects, proved unprecedented. Never has such a response, on the part of many, been known, and there have been several progressive records. Six weeks, Sunday, October 16, to Sunday, November 20, were set aside for the campaign, and it was found not a day too long. Eight laymen of the parish, three from the vestry and five from the congregation, very carefully worked out a complete plan. It was presented in a written letteer, sent to every home, and freely distributed at all the services. This plan consisted of three phases—every member worshipping regularly, every member working earnestly, every member giving systematically. Mid-week conferences were held, and well attended, for the purpose of discussing everything of the campaign that had previously been outlined. The rector, the Rev. William Porkess, was requested by the committee to preach a course of twelve sermons, covering the six Sundays, morning and evening, of the campaign. He very frankly talked money throughout this series, under the title of. "The Eloquence of Money." The method of tithing was given a prominent place, and many parishioners have gone on record as tithers. The closing service, Sunday evening, November 20, proved to be a spiritual climax. During the intensive and last week of the campaign the new pledge cards for 1922 had been delivered to all the homes of the parish, and the parishioners were urged to make out their pledges, bring them to the church, and deposit same in a locked box kept there. This box was emptied by the parish treasurer Sunday afternoon, November 20, and all the names, without amounts, were read at the closing and evening service of the same day by the rector from the altar steps, followed with special prayeer for all represented by these names. The church was well filled and the spiritual impression will long last.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. C. T. Olmsted, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., Coadjutor.

St. Mark's Church, Syracuse (the Rev. Percy T. Fenn, D. D., rector): On Thursday evening, December 1, the wardens and vestrymen of St. Mark's Church, with their wives, gave their rector and his family a very delightful "surprise party." It was the beginning of Dr. Fenn's second year as rector, and they came to offer their congratulations, and to wish them Godspeed for the coming year.

They brought with them delicious refreshments, and during the evening the senior warden, Mr. Frank L. Lyman, presented Mr. Fenn, in the name of the vestry, with a copy of Wells' "Outlines of History."

The work in St. Mark's is growing splendidly, and during Dr. Fenn's past year he has made 2,200 calls, prepared and presented sixty-six for confirmation, had his church consecrated, and secured one postulant for Holy Orders. This makes twenty-two postulants he has secured during his ministry.

In the "Every-Member Canvass" made on November 20, over eighty new pledges were secured, and also many increased pledges.

Logan: On September 16, 1921, at Pensacola, Fla., at the home of her daughter, Mrs. S. R. Mallory Kennedy, MRS. ANNA C. LOGAN, of Salem, Va. widow of Colonel R. H. Logan and daughter of the late James W. and Sarah Strother Logan, formerly of "Dungeness," Goochland County, Va. Interment at Salem, Va.

MRS. SOPHIE MERCER SLAUGHTER.

MRS. SLAUGHTER'S death in November, at her home, near Mitchell, Va., was a loss to the whole section in which she had spent her long life. If ever a pure, Christian woman was a blessing, under God, to her community, she was. She was born in an old Virginia family and gifted with many qualities of heart and mind which drew to her a large circle of friends. To these she was loyal and true to the end. Faith in Christ and love for the Church and its work were to her the main purpose of life, and her whole thought was devoted to the service of her Master. Her last words were a confession of faith in Him.

She was the daughter of Rev. Philip Slaughter and Anna Sophia Semmes. In her early life she was with her father in Petersburg, Va., and afterwards she was his secretary and helper during the years he spent on Slaughter's Mountain, in Culpeper County. She possessed much of the mental force and poetic taste and refinement which characterized both her parents. These gifts developed as she grew older, and were evidenced by the large and constant correspondence she carried on to the day of her death. Her letters were models of refined faith and love, and they carried comfort and encouragement to many hearts. The world was better for her being in it because her life was a continual service of love.

Shortly after the Civil War she married Mr. Thomas Slaughter and lived for over fifty years on the same farm her father had owned.. Their home, "Cedar Croft," was built at the foot of the mountain. It became one of the most hospitable and delightful resorts in the State, filled every summer with relatives and friends. The old-fashioned, open house, Virginia hospitality abounded. The little church, "All Saints," was built on a corner of the farm, and it is in the church yard, behind the church, her body was laid by the side of father, mother and sister, awaiting the resurrection day.

"For all the saints, who from their labors rest,
Who Thee by faith before the world confessed,
Thy Name, O Jesus, be forever blest.
Alleluia."

MRS. FLORENCE POWELL BROOKES.

"Until the day break and the shadows flee away."

Entered into everlasting life at eventide in the Alexandria Hospital on Wednesday, July 13, 1921, FLORENCE POWELL BROOKS, wife of William Fowle Brooks, of Alexandria, Va., after a long and painful illness, borne with true submission to the will of her heavenly Father.

She was the daughter of William Alexander Powell (eldest son of Leven Powell, Jr.), of Leesburg, Va., and Lucy Peachy Lee, his wife, daughter of the Hon. Daniel Lee, of Woodstock, Winchester, Va.

She is survived by her husband and her daughters, Miss Esther Fowle Brookes, of Alexandria, Va., and Mrs. William Lewis Packard, of Geneva, N. Y.; also by her sons, Alexander Powell Brookes, of Baltimore, Md., and William Fowle Brookes, of Alexandria Va.

Born in Leesburg, Va., where the old life of the ancient Dominion gave its beauty, dignity and grace to the home, she, as the youngest of the family, was cherished and beloved by all. Her brothers were Colonel Daniel Lee Powell, of Richmond, Va.; the Rev. John D. Powell, the consecrated rector for many years of St. John's Church, Portsmouth, Va.; Dr. Alfred Harrison Powell, of Baltimore, Md., and Hugh Lee Powell, of Leesburg, Va. Three sisters, well known to us, were Mrs. Frederick Lloyd, of Maryland; Mrs. Frank F. Jones, of New York, and Mrs. James Evans, of Florence, S. C.

Not only was Mrs. Brookes from her early years gifted with beauty of person and nobility of character, but she possessed a cultivated mind, well furnished by study and reading. Music was her especial delight, as by her skillful touch it poured forth from the instrument with inspiring power responsive to her spirit. Especially was this true of church music and the singing of the hymns she loved which comforted and uplifted her amidst the many duties and cares of life.

Some will still remember her at her brother's school in Richmond, known as the Richmond Female Seminary, where she spent several happy years, first as a scholar and then as teacher and a member of the home, from which she was married in 1871, and then made Alexandria her residence for the rest of her life.

In her home there she faithfully performed all the duties which fell to her lot. She was a mother indeed to her children, and gave herself entirely to them in loving devotion to their highest interests.

She was a loyal member of St. Paul's Church, loved its sacred services, and gave herself willingly to the work of the Sewing Society and the Sunday school. The first will always remember her love and interest in its welfare—a sewing class for girls, the making of garments for the poor, and placing them where most needed. In the Sunday school she was a devoted teacher, and a warm, loving friend to the children entrusted to her care. She named her class after the late Frances Ridley Havergal, that saintly writer of the Church of England, whom, in company with many others, she admired so much. The banner now used by the class was her own work. and the first hymn boards ever used in St. Paul's Church were contributed by the class. With true joy, unfailing interest and helpfulness in this blessed service for Christ she continued until home duties and increasing loss of hearing shut her off, in God's order, from these and other good works she would have loved to "carry on."

While lying sick in the Alexandria Hospital she and Mr. Brookes celebrated their golden wedding on the 19th of January, 1921. Although weak and suffering from prolonged illness, she had such a happy day. Two bridesmaids of the long ago and a few friends gathered together to unite in the celebration which brought sacred memories of the past to mind, enlisting them with the thoughts of the present. Then after a few months the blessed release came and she entered within the gates of pearl, into that city of peace and rest where the Lamb sitteth upon His throne, and His servants serve Him and forever see His face.

"To live in hearts where love we find
Is life—which e'en with heaven may vie;
To live in hearts we leave behind
Is not—to die!"

—S. W.

CATHERINE WARREN CARSON.

At the Johns Hopkins Hospital, in Baltimore, on December 1, 1921, CATHERINE WARREN CARSON, the beloved and only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. Preston Carson, of "Dundee," Richmond, Va., in her nineteenth year, entered peacefully into eternal life. Besides her parents, she is survived by two brothers, Theodore Montague and Joseph Preston, Jr., and her grandfather, Mr. J. J. Montague.

The gathering of sorrowing friends at the funeral services, at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Forest Hill, could not be contained in the church. More genuine grief in the whole community in which she lived has never been known. People of all classes and of all ages loved her, and it seemed as though not one home, but hundreds, had lost, each of them, a member of its own intimate circle.

Expressions of appreciation of the character of this lovely young girl came often during her life time, and not alone in these sad later days. She was chosen four successive years as president of her class at the Collegiate School for Girls, from which she graduated last June. She was made the captain of her basketball team, and she was awarded the Rosemary medal, which is given by vote of all the students of the school, for qualities of leadership. This medal bears the inscription: "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life."

When one left her presence it was not the impression of her physical charm, as beautiful as she was, that lingered longest. An influence, an intangible presence, went out from her. This spiritual quality, this intensity of spirit, was felt by so many that there has been a remarkable agreement between numbers of independent expressions. One who had known her intimately wrote: "Lives such as hers are a blessed assurance to us all, of the imperishability of the spirit."

One of her teachers wrote: "Of all the girls whom I have taught and known, Catherine seems to stand at the very head in certain radiant qualities of heart and feeling. I have always thought there was a sort of spiritual loveliness about her, even greater than her physical loveliness."

Many of her friends have expressed in different forms their feeling that she had brought a touch of brightness and joy into their lives, and that they had been made better by knowing her.

She was the leading character in a play given by her school at the time of her graduation. It was a beautiful Irish story, in which the "wee-folk" figured, the unseen little people that are so real to the Celtic race. Catherine so lived the part she was playing that she seemed really to see and commune with the little spirits that were supposed to be about her.

It seems now almost to have been a prophecy, that she herself was soon to be one of the unseen spirits whom we believe to be "not far from every one of us." So real does her continued presence seem to many of us that some of the bitterness of grief is taken away, and a sweet sorrow takes its place.

She was a lover of children, music and flowers, and of God's great outdoors. She excelled in outdoor sports, and was physically strong and well developed. But her face was like a flower, of a gentle and delicate beauty. As one looks back on her life now, she seems to have been a temporary incarnation, in a beautiful body, of some bright spirit from an upper sphere, not intended to abide here for long, but loaned to us, to lighten and brighten this world a bit; and now, having served the purpose for which God sent her, to have passed on to serve in other realms; and yet her spirit is here with us, too.

"I cannot say, and I will not say,
That she is dead—she is just away;
With a cheery smile and a wave of her hand
She has wandered into an unknown land,
And left us dreaming how very fair
It needs must be, since she lingers there.
But you, oh you, with the aching yearn,
For the old-time step and the glad return,
Think of her faring on, as dear
In the love of There, as the love of here.
Think of her just the same, I say,
She is not dead—she is just away."

Personal Notes

The Rev. Ira D. Lang, who resigned the rectorship of St. John's Church, Bellevue, Dayton, Ky., has accepted work in the Diocese of Texas.

The Rev. Clarence W. Bispham, former rector of St. Philip's Church, Philadelphia, has just returned from a trip around the world, during which he made a study of conditions in China and Japan. He preached in St. Philip's Church Sunday morning, December 11.

The Rev. John F. Coleman, the rector of St. Paul's Church, Suffolk, in the Diocese of Southern Virginia, has accepted a call to the rectorship of Greenway Court Parish, Clarke County. He will enter upon his new work about January 15, 1922.

The Rev. William S. Bishop, D. D., has been appointed chaplain of the National Cathedral School of Girls, and will give instruction in the Department of Sacred Studies. His address is 1855 Calvert Street, Washington, D. C.

The Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, Jr., has accepted the call to St. Andrew's Church, in Canton, N. C., and surrounding mission stations in Western North Carolina. Mr. McClellan was recently minister in charge at St. John's in Salisbury, Conn., and previous to that for nearly three years he was the Episcopal missionary of the "Big Bend" of Texas along the Mexican border.

The Rev. C. Sturges Ball, recently pastor of the Associate Congregational Church, Baltimore, has applied for orders in the Episcopal Church. He was recently confirmed by Bishop Murray, and by him placed in temporary charge of the Church of the Transfiguration, Baltimore.

The address of the Rev. D. A. Sanford is changed from Victoria, Tex., to 3405 Main Street, Houston, Tex.

The Rev. S. C. Hughson and the Rev. McV. Harrison, of the Order of the Holy Cross, have been conducting a successful mission in St. Luke's Church, Baltimore, the Rev. Henry Nelson O'Connor, rector.

Ordinations.

On Sunday, October 16, in St. Paul's Church, Wells, Vt., the Rev. William John Brown was advanced to the priesthood by the Bishop Coadjutor of Vermont. Assisting in the service were the Rev. W. H. Bamford (who presented the candidate), the Rev. Professor Jenks, of the General Seminary (who preached the sermon), and the Rev. L. C. Denney. Mr. Brown will continue in charge of the parish at Wells, where he has ministered as lay reader and deacon.

On Tuesday, November 8, in St. Paul's Church, San Diego, Cal., Mr. Waldo D. Parker was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Stevens. Mr. Parker was presented by the Rev. C. L. Barnes, rector of the parish, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Philip Easley, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Hollywood, Los Angeles. The Rev. C. T. Murphy, of All Saints', San Diego, read the Litany. The Rev. Mr. Parker will take charge of St. Jude's Church, Burbank, Cal.

In St. James' Pro-Cathedral, Fresno, Cal., Mr. Ernest Albert Shapland, formerly a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was recently ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Sanford. The candidate was presented by the Rev. W. H. Hawken, of Merced. The preacher was the Very Rev. G. R. E. MacDonald, of Fresno. Mr. Shapland has been appointed the vicar of the Church of the Holy Spirit, St. James' Parish, Fresno.

At St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral, Los Angeles, on November 19, the Rev. Frederick C. Miller, deacon, was ordained to the priesthood. The preacher on this occasion was the Bishop of the Diocese of Los Angeles. Mr. Miller was presented by the Rev. J. A. Evans, Dean of the Convocation of Los Angeles. The Very Rev. William MacCormack, Dean of the Pro-Cathedral, read the Litany; the Rev. Dr. M. C. Dotten the Epistle, the Rev. W. F. Hubbard the Gospel, the Bishop Coadjutor celebrating. The Rev. Mr. Miller is a graduate of the Church Divinity School of the Pacific. He is in charge of the work at the Mission of the Good Shepherd, Hemet, and of St. Paul's Mission, San Jacinto.

Deaths.

The Rev. Samuel C. Thompson, retired, died on October 17 at his home in Clearwater, Fla. Funeral services were held at the Church of the Ascension, Clearwater, the Rev. A. T. Cornwall officiating. Owing to ill health, Mr. Thompson was obliged to retire from active service two years ago, after a ministry of forty-four years.

The Rev. Henry Homer Washburn, rector-emeritus of Christ Church, Oyster Bay, L. I., passed away Saturday, November 5, at the home of his son, Henry S. Washburn, Plainville, Conn. The funeral service was held at the Church of Our Saviour in Plainville, the rector, the Rev. George Hilton, officiating, assisted by Rev. George E. Talmage, rector of Christ Church, Oyster Bay, L. I., and the Rev. Chauncey J. Linsley, D. D., rector of Trinity Church, Torrington, Conn. Interment was made in the family plot in Worcester, Mass.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL

549. "Good Christian men, rejoice,
With heart, and soul, and voice;
Give ye heed to what we say:
Jesus Christ is born to-day."

This famous carol, In dulci jubilo, is the oldest and most widely known. Its original words, following a general mediaeval practive, quite natural where all church services were in Latin, combined Latin with the vernacular. Both words and tune come down from the fourteenth century. Their popularity became very great before the Reformation, and still increased after it.

The carol was first published in England in 1708, and not long afterward it was introduced into America by the Unitas Fratrum, also known as Moravians, who used the carol in their Pennsylvania missions to the Indians. On one occasion early in the eighteenth century it is recoredd that it was simultaneously sung in half a dozen different Indian tongues.

This is one of the many beautiful carols which appear in

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

He who is blind to the Christ in the little child may also fail to see the prophet when he comes.—A. Mackennal.

Whatever good is to be done in the world, even though it is God Himself Who does it, cannot be done without a sacrifice.—Dean Stanley.

Merry Christmas. For the sake of the children, for the sake of the men and women they will be, for the sake of the world which they will make more Christ-like. Merry Christmas.

God be with thee—upon earth He sought us
Home and love to share;
Set His heart upon the souls that wander
From the Father's care;
God be with thee! 'Tis no idle utterance
This—my Christmas prayer.
—Mary Georges.

God Himself is the ever-blessed God. He dwells in the light of joy as well as of purity. The great Christian graces are radiant with happiness. Faith, hope, charity—there is no sadness in them. As we become more saintly we have less sin to sorrow over. The religion of Christ consoles wretchedness, and brightens with a divine glory the lustre of every inferior joy. —T. Dale.

A glad tenderness sweeps over us when we catch the echo of our Lord's word: "Whosoever shall humble himself as this little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven." It is a kindred joy which we possess whenever we take little children up in our arms to bless them by making them happy.

Nothing makes people love us so much as our appreciation of them. We are all hungry for a recognition of the bit of good that we have, the bit of gold mingled with the dose. Yet how few of us take the trouble to find that in other people which we can appreciate.—C. H. Elmore.

Music has been called the speech of the angels. I will go further and call it the speech of God Himself. Without words it is wonderful—blessed—one of God's best gifts to men. But in singing you have both the wonders together, music and words. Why is there music in heaven? Because in music there is no self-will. It goes on certain laws and rules which man did not make, but has only found out. Music is a pattern of the everlasting life in heaven, because in heaven, as in music, is perfect freedom and perfect pleasure; and yet that freedom comes not from throwing away law, but from obeying God's law perfectly; and that pleasure comes not from a self-will, and doing each what he likes, but from perfectly doing the will of the Father Who is in heaven. And that in itself would be sweet music, even if there were neither voice nor sound in heaven. Some of us may not be able to make music with our voices; but we can make it with our hearts, and join in the angels' Christmas Day song, if not with our lips, yet in our lives.—Charles Kingsley.

THE BEST RESPONSE TO CHRISTMAS

When the Magi came to Bethlehem at that first Christmas time to find the King and Saviour, they opened their treasures and presented unto Him gifts. So would we do at Christmas time again. And when we ask how we may give to Him, we remember that He said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

The things we give to Him through others may be of different kinds. We can give our wealth, and there is need of that this year. There are homes darkened by the spectre of unemployment. There are men and women who have nothing for themselves, and harder than that for their affection, have nothing for their children. It is good to know that the Spirit of Jesus will move many hearts in this Christmas time to relieve distress, and to find Christ as He looks at them through the gratitude of human eyes.

But the gifts which money buys are not all, and unless something else beside money enters into them, they may often be in the end as nothing. There are homes which are filled with everything that money can buy, and yet are starved of joy because love has forgotten its old accents of tenderness. There are hearts which are hungering for gifts that cannot be represented by jewels or any lavishness of gold. There are old joys that might be found again, disillusioned confidences that might be restored, bells of gladness broken now by the shock of some old cruelty of deed, or by the many little thrusts of the cruel word, which might be recast in the fire of an affection which has found itself, and the music of love and laughter restored where now there is only a weary silence. Shall we not remember these things under the spell of Christmas Day? Shall we not recall how, close to us, closer even than the homes of our neighbors, closer than the needs of the poor, may be the need of those at our very side whose lives we have impoverished because through our pre-occupation with selfish things, and through the slow engrossment of our worldly-mindedness, we have forgotten to give those finest gifts of an understanding love which only those can learn who learn it from their touch with Jesus? "They opened their treasures and presented unto Him gifts." He waits in the person of every life that needs the inspiration of new kindness and of old devotion newly expressed. He waits for us to give out of that deepest treasury of hearts which have learned that all else is emptiness except the gift of love.

THE CHURCH PAPERS AND PROHIBITION

From one of our correspondents we have received a letter which, in the midst of cordial expressions, contains also a message that indicates a curious misconception. "As you have invited your readers to make suggestions as to what the Southern Churchman should stand for, which is not already covered by its columns, I suggest," the writer says, "that you take up the subject of National Prohibition. As regards this subject, it appears to me, at least, that you have been sadly silent in reference to this all-important matter. In the words of another, 'Of all the wars we have ever had, none have played so disastrous a part to the human family as the demon rum.' Yet we find so many Christian people, so many of our clergy, as well as our Church papers, who are pitifully silent on this subject—the all-important subject of the day. I plead with you, therefore, to devote some of your columns to this important subject, to the end that the influence of your splendid paper may be used in the keeping down of this greatest menace to our men and women, and that you use also that influence in defense of the law of the land."

Our correspondent would need only to look through the files of our past issues to see how remarkably mistaken is the idea that the Southern Churchman has been "silent as to this important matter." There is no matter concerning which we have spoken more plainly. In the issue of July 16th, for example, under the title, "An Authentic Voice of Leadership," we reviewed and endorsed with hearty emphasis the address of the Bishop of Newark to his Diocesan Convention concerning the duty of good citizens to honor and uphold the prohibition laws. The Southern Churchman was first among the Church papers, so far as we know, to protest against the implications of Bishop Gailor's regrettable speech in Salt Lake City, wherein he gave the impression that the prohibition amendment had been enacted in hysteria and could not be enforced—all of which our correspondent and others may read in the issue which came out no longer ago than October 22. Furthermore, it would be easy to multiply the references to editorials in which this paper has stood squarely in the fight to end the traffic of intoxicating liquor in this country once and for all.

Nor, as a matter of fact, have others of the great Church weeklies been "silent in reference to this matter." It is interesting to follow the symposium of opinions from leaders in the Church published in the last two numbers of The Churchman, of New York, registering as they do the emphatic condemnation of bishops, priests and laymen of any violation of the prohibition law. That stout fighter, the editor of The Living Church, has also left no doubt as to where his paper stands. No enemy, open or secret, of the prohibition amendment has received any aid or comfort from him, but positively and constructively he has stood for the observance of the law.

It is a good thing to make these facts plain. There are people in this Church of ours who violate the prohibition laws by buying contraband liquor: they are just as guilty of wrong-doing, and ought to be just as much under the social ban, as the bootlegger who sells it; and the plainer that is said the better. If there are any men and women who oppose the prohibition law as a matter of conscience, honestly believing that its social consequences are and will be evil, let them work openly for its repeal. But that is not the class which is causing trouble. The difficulty is that a great many persons view the whole matter not in its social aspect at all, but with deliberate and angry selfishness. They have not stopped to find out whether the prohibition amendment, fairly tried, is working and will work a benefit to human life in general. They see nothing except some license of their own abridged. This is the antithesis of Christian imagination. There is room always for differences in judgment as to the practicability of any given law, but there ought not to be room for difference as to the spirit in which Christians are obligated to weigh it. No Christian has a right to separate himself in thought and interest from his neighbors. His duty is to support—even though his own preferences be abridged—the policies which will bring the greatest good to all. When we mix our religion with our politics and our morality to this extent, the discreditable breaking of law by otherwise respectable people will be shamed by their own consciences and stopped by their own better choice.

ON READING GOOD BOOKS

The invention of the printing press and the making of many books have not been an unmixed blessing. Long ago when books were made by hand and the creation of each single one was a process requiring a long and loving patience, only those writings which were of genuine worth were made into books, for trivial stuff could not command the devotion of a scribe to deal with it. A book then was a thing of dignity, wrought out of the very best that life and skill could give; and to read a book was to receive a message conceived and embodied in reverence for lovely things. But the printing press, which has made available for multitudes the literary masterpieces which once belonged only to the privileged few, has also made possible the circulation of chaff which once would have been disdained. So our book markets are flooded with scribblings, written to afford trivial amusement, and often printed and bound in a fashion as cheap and ephemeral as their text. Thousands of men and women, and children, too, never know any better reading than the trashy books or the sensational pages and the comic supplement of the Sunday newspapers. The taste which ought to be sensitive to beauty is made common by the unworthy husks it feeds on.

One of the best desires which we might cherish at Christmas time is to recover this fine appreciation of beautiful and worthy things. Especially should we begin with the children. Fortunately, the standard in the publication of children's books is higher than that applying to books which are published for the so-called maturer minds. Every Christmas season witnesses a wealth of old favorites republished with the beautiful artistry which the constant development in color printing makes more remarkable, and new volumes which add to the permanent literature of childhood. Of such, for example, are the exquisite editions of "The Golden Fleece," and "The King of Ireland's Son," by Padraic Colum, published by Macmillan, with illustrations by Pogany, reviewed in the Southern Churchman last week, and three volumes from the press of the Volland Company, which are reviewed today. Books such as these are "open sesames" to treasuries of beautiful things. Boys and girls, and all others who keep the youthful spirit, can enter through their pages into a fairyland bright with the colors of utmost imaginings. It is good to consider and apply to all books for children this ideal which the Volland Company has long set for itself—"that books should make children happy and build character unconsciously; that the stories be full of action and interest, made still more attractive by pictures in colors," and that they "should contain nothing to cause fright, suggest fear, glorify mischief, extenuate malice, or condone cruelty."

Turning from the children to the adults, it would be possible again to suggest books which rise in excellence like high hills above the dreary valleys of the commonplace and meretricious mass which often the book-sellers find most in demand. We have reviewed in the Southern Churchman latterly certain books of an outstanding character, and shall review others in the New Year issues. When we consider the books which are available for the discriminating reader, the wonder grows that so many men and women are content to waste their time reading not at all, or else reading that which had as well be left unread. The secret of profitable reading is what Arnold Bennett pointed out in "How to Live on Twenty-four Hours a Day." It is the secret of utilizing the little fragments of time which most people let drift aimlessly to waste. Look, for instance, at the passengers in a railroad train. Men and women will ride all day, possessed of that boon so rare in the crowded hurly-burly of our usual days—quiet, and freedom from interruption; and yet not one out of ten will ever have thought to bring a book. Watch the people who sit in doctors' offices and dentists' offices, or who wait somewhere else for an appointment. How many of these have slipped some volume into their pocket by the aid of which they can turn the minutes into golden account? Many of us talk of having no time to read, whereas the truth is simply that we do not know how to utilize the time there is, and one reason we waste so much time which might be spent in reading is because the things we read are so empty that they do not create in us the hunger that would make us count each moment of possible reading precious. To cultivate the taste for good books by reading only the best, to use time thoughtfully so that we read much because we always have something at hand to read—this is the way to store the mind with riches beyond all price.

MORE BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS

THE CHRISTMAS STORY. Illustrated by John Rae.

MOTHER GOOSE. Edited by Eulalie O. Grover and illustrated by Frederick Richardson. $1.35.

AMERICAN INDIAN FAIRY TALES. Retold by W. T. Larned. Illustrated by John Rae. $1.35. P. F. Volland Co. All in gift boxes.

Upon the general character of the Volland books we have commented already in the editorial, "On Reading Good Books." These three particular volumes embody to the full the ideal of excellent beauty which the Volland name has long represented. As gift books they could hardly be surpassed, and a feature not to be despised is the fact that in these days of high costs of printing, they are notably reasonable in price.

"The Christmas Story" has the jewel-like quality of some old missal illuminated by hands that worshipped in every stroke of color and touch of gold. It is the second chapter of the gospel of St. Luke, and the second chapter of the gospel of St. Matthew, printed in old English type on double paper, with six full-page illustrations, and decorations both within and without the covers, by John Rae.

The "Mother Goose" is enough to turn any grown-up into a would-be child again; for the old rhymes lead on through pages with decorated borders of marching geese to full-page pictures in color which Frederick Richardson has made as delightsome as the verses themselves.

Another book which John Rae has clothed with a rainbow is the "American Indian Fairy Tales," and the tales are worthy of their illumination. "To young America from the oldest Americans!" runs the dedication; and the stories, retold by W. T. Larned, are with one exception adapted from the legends collected by Henry R.

THE LOVE OF GOD, AND CHRISTMAS

A Sermon to Children

By the Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D.

A LITTLE while ago I heard of something which a small boy said to his father, and it was such a nice thing to say that I think a great many other boys and girls will want to go and say it to their fathers and mothers, too. This little boy was playing one day in the room where his father was, and of a sudden he left his toys and came and climbed up on his father's chair. "Daddy," he said, "I love you, and I want to do something about it!"

The little boy was exactly right. All at once it had come to him what love really is. It is not just saying words. It is not an idle feeling. It is knowing that somebody else is so dear to you, and being so thankful that somebody else is so good to you, that you must "do something about it."

Perhaps the little boy had begun to think of the sort of way in which other people loved him. There was his father. His father loved him, and his father was always "doing something about it." Didn't his father go down town every morning and work hard all day so that he could make a living for his family and have the money to buy the food, and clothes, and all the nice things with which the little boy was surrounded? Didn't he every once in a while, when he went off on a trip, bring back the wonderfulest surprise with him—that big toy boat with the sails that went up and down, the Robinson Crusoe book with colored pictures in it, and the other things which he knew a boy would like? And didn't his father play ball with him in the evenings if he got home before supper, or in the winter read to him before the fire? He did not have to wonder whether or not his father loved him, because his father was "doing something about it" every day.

Then it was the same way with his mother. Didn't he remember how once he was sick in bed a long, long time, and how, whenever he woke up at night, all hot and restless with the fever, there was his mother's face bending over him and his mother's touch so comforting and cool? Who was it but his mother whom he ran to that day when he cut his hand on the broken glass? And didn't he go to her about every single thing he needed, and get her to help find the toys that he couldn't find. And wasn't she always teaching him new games to play, and didn't she give him that party on his birthday—and was there really anything at all, anywhere, which made him happiest that she did not have a hand in? All the time she was loving him, and all the time she was "doing something about it."

So that is what made the boy of a sudden climb upon his father's chair and tell him—and when his mother came in I suppose he told her the same—that he wanted to "do something about it" to show his love for the ones he loved. What could he do? he asked his father. What could he do to show his love to him? And his father told him that the very best thing his boy could do for him was to be very loving to the one that both of them loved best, which was his mother; and his father taught him some of the ways in which he could do something about that. He told him how he could stop and think and plan what would make his mother happiest, and be considerate in the little things that would keep her from getting tired. He told him how he could always go to where his mother was when he wanted to ask her anything instead of calling for his mother to come to him, and how he could find her a chair and persuade her to sit down when she needed rest, and be glad to run errands for her and take all sorts of trouble for her, and keep a happy face, because that made her glad. All that would be doing something about the love the boy had to his father, because it would be making his father know that his boy wanted to be like him, and to do the things his father would want to do.

Then there was another thing his father told him. He said that the love of God is just like the kind of love the little boy wanted to show. It is a love that is always "doing something about it."

At Christmas time especially we remember that. For the Father in heaven saw that His children here on earth needed some one to teach them to be good, and so to be glad and happy; and He gave the one greatest gift He had. He gave His own best beloved Son to come down to be a little baby in Bethlehem, and to be a boy in Nazareth, and to grow up into the Man who went about doing good everywhere—helping people who had done wrong to want to be good, helping the poor to feel rich because He loved them, helping everybody to learn how beautiful life could be when they lived it in His way. So God, Who loved the world, "did something about it," and Jesus, the Son of God, went everywhere making men remember that love because He remembered it too.

And at Christmas time we must learn the lesson of that love of God. He has loved us and given us all the beautiful gift of the life of Jesus. And we must do something about it. We must try to make other people happy. We must not think only of what we hope other people will give us, but of the poor, and the unhappy, and the little, friendless children to whom we can carry gifts for the sake of Jesus.

"For dearly, dearly has He loved,
And we must love Him too."

And the one best way of all to show we love Him is—

"To try His works to do."

FAIRY TALES AND STORIES. By Hans Christian Andersen. Edited by Signe Toksvig. Illustrations by Eric Pape, with a preface by Frances Hackett. The Macmillan Company, New York. Pp. 214. Price $2.00.

The fairy tales of Hans Christian Andersen need little commendation to child readers of today, or to those who remember the happy privileges of childhood in their own earlier years; for few, it is to be hoped, are the children who have not read of Big Claus and Little Claus, of Elisa and the Wild Swans, and of the rest of that company with which Hans Andersen has filled his fairyland. Why, then, a new edition? And what is there different in this from others? In the first place, because this is a new translation, made by Miss Toksvig, herself a Dane, and a countrywoman, therefore, of Hans Andersen. It is simple and easy to read, in the informal style which Hans Andersen himself used, stripped of the sentimentality and stilted phrases with which some of the translators have veiled the simplicity of the original.

In the second place, the book is most charmingly illustrated, with delicate drawings in black and white by Eric Pape, and, most quaint and delightful of all, the reproduction of a number of silhouettes cut out of paper by Hans Andersen himself.

HOW CAN WE KNOW THE WAY? By W. H. Jefferys. The Educational Division, Church Missions House, New York. Pp. 178. Price 75 cents in cloth, 60 cents in paper.

Nothing is more conspicuous among the results of present-day study of the gospels than the rediscovery of the supreme place which Jesus gave in His teaching to the message of the Kingdom of God. This rediscovery has greatly altered the perspective of Christian thinking. It has shown us the nearness and immediacy of our obligation to service, and taught us that companionship with the Master is not an idle imagining of heaven, but an association with Him in constructive purposes which begin here and now.

Dr. Jefferys, in the foreign field and in the City Mission work of Philadelphia, has been one of the Church's true builders of the Kingdom of God, and this book has the weight therefore of a life behind it. It is made up of brief chapters which take the Master's teachings about the Kingdom and apply these with insight and vividness to our responsibility for Christian life and service every day. "All Seekers after the Kingdom of God," to whom the book is dedicated, will see their way clearer by the light of its pages.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY IN THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

A Summary View of this Church's Position

By the Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D.

Origins.

THE Episcopal Church sees, in our Lord's idea of His Church, the purpose of a ministry, as truly as a gospel to be preached and sacraments to be administered. But this Church claims no definite word or act of our Lord—further than His appointment of the original apostles—determining any particular and final form of the Christian Ministry; nor any formal institution by the apostles themselves of such a ministry. This Church does see in the New Testament records, and so in the apostolic period, the beginnings of such a ministry, and also sees it taking on, shortly after the apostolic period, a definie and settled form.

Hence this declaration (in the Preface to our Ordinal): "It is evident unto all men, diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the apostles' time there have been these Orders of Ministry in Christ's Church —Bishops, Priests and Deacons." This is this Church's statement of what she believes to be simple historic fact. But she also believes that this development and settled constitution of the Christian Ministry was, if not divinely fore-ordered, at least divinely over-ruled. (See the language of the Ordinal: "Almighty God, Who by Thy Holy Spirit . . . Who by Thy divine providence . . . hast appointed divers Orders in Thy Church, etc.") Further, as soon as history presents a clear view of the common organization of the Christian Church, this Church finds the three-fold form of the ministry practically everywhere and always prevalent down to Reformation times. And therefore she declares her "intent that, as these offices were evermore had in reverend estimation, so these orders shall be continued and reverently used and esteemed in this Church."

Orders.

Thus this Church holds these "offices" to be three distinct "orders" of ministers and not merely various functionings of one and the same order of ministry.

The distinct powers and duties of Bishops this Church holds to be apostolic in character; (1) in general, those of officers and councillors of the Church Universal, representing its corporate consciousness (every Bishop is, among us, primarily and expressly consecrated "a Bishop in the Church of God," and only secondarily for this Church and a particular jurisdiction); and (2) more specifically, those of Ordination, Confirmation and Government.

The powers and duties of the priest are the ministration of the Word and Sacraments and Discipline in the local congregation. But this priesthood is not only a mediatorial priesthood, but a ministerial priesthood; doubly representative, at once of Christ and of the priesthood of all believers; acting for God toward men (as in preaching, absolution, benediction), and for and with men toward God (as in the "we" of the Prayer of Consecration in the Communion Office).

The duties of the deacon are to assist the priest in divine service, especially in the Holy Communion, to baptize infants, to instruct the youth and to care for the sick and poor.

Ordination.

(Requirements.) These are of three kinds: (a) Educational. A Bishop-elect is presumably a well-learned man. A candidate for Priests' or Deacons' Orders must comply with a specified educational standard and pass strict examinations accordingly. (b) Canonical. A Bishop-elect can be consecrated only with the formal consent of the whole Church, acting representatively; and a priest or deacon ordained, only with the consent of the whole Diocese, acting representatively. In each case there must be also a previous declaration of faith in the Holy Scriptures and a pledge of conformity to "the Doctrine (including the two Creeds), Discipline and Worship" of this Church. (c) Spiritual. In each case spiritual qualifications are openly tested at the time of ordination by ordination vows, testifying to the inward call of the Holy Spirit and the sufficiency of Holy Scripture, and also pledging devoutness and exemplariness of life, good-will toward all Christians, loyalty to this Church and canonical obedience to her constituted authorities.

(Who Ordains?) A Bishop is "ordained or consecrated" only by Bishops. A priest is "ordered" by a Bishop; other priests uniting in the laying on of hands. Deacons are "made" by a Bishop alone.

(How Ordained?) In all cases, by prayer, with the Laying on of Hands, followed by a formal delivery of the Holy Scriptures.

(Meaning of Ordination.) Ordination in the Episcopal Church means an act of official authorization. It also means an act of spiritual endowment.

It authorizes the exercise of the particular office. But the authority given is not that of the ordaining Bishop, or of the particular congregation or church, but of the whole Church of God; that is, it is the continuation of the original ministerial commission of our Lord to His Church, to and through His apostles.

Ordination is also, with us, an act of additional spiritual endowment. The antecedent call of the Holy Spirit is fully testified and recognized in admission to ordination. But we believe that there is also "a grace of Orders," that is, a special gift of the Holy Spirit in answer to the ordaining prayer, for the special work of the ministry; and that that gift is not only symbolized, but also pledged, by the laying on of hands—that is, actually given in connection with this. The ordaining words are (in the case of a Bishop): "Receive the Holy Ghost for the Office and Work, etc. . . . Stir up the grace of God, which is given thee by this Imposition of our hands, etc."; (in the case of a priest): "Receive the Holy Ghost for the Office and Work, etc. . . . Whosoever sins, etc. . . . Be a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of His Holy Sacraments." These are substantially the very words of our Lord Himself and of St. Paul. But they are variously understood among us; on the one hand, as implying a grace transmitted through the ordainers to the ordained; on the other, as implying a gift direct from God Himself to the ordained. However, this Church, as such, not only leaves both of these interpretations open, but also in the American Episcopal Church, in the case of a priest, supplies an alternative form of words of simple authorization to "minister the Word and Sacraments."

Authority.

The authority, other than spiritual, of the ministry in the Episcopal Church is not autocratic, but strictly constitutional, largely defined and limited by (canonical) law.

In our legislative bodies the Bishops share, with the clergy and laity, the right of initiative, and legislation must be concurrent to become law. An individual Bishop's "godly counsel" and "godly judgment" command the fullest respect of his clergy and people; but his powers or discipline are strictly defined. No minister can be deprived of his rights and status except for certain specified offenses, and after trial by his peers, with the right of appeal. The Bishop alone pronounces the specified sentence.

The rights, powers and duties of the priest as rector of a parish are also defined and limited. In control of the church property and funds, the congregation may, in certain cases, act quite independently of him.

Other Ministries.

The Episcopal Church nowhere denies the validity or efficacy of other ministries than her own. She believes that in Episcopacy she holds in trust her share of the most ancient, most general, most authoritative, and so most valuable form of the Christian ministry. Therefore she will permit the exercise of no other ministry among her own people. This is her only practical means of publicly vindicating Episcopacy as inseparable from the fact of the historic Church, and so as invaluable also to the permanent well-being of Christ's Church, considered, not in individual ministries or particular communions, or in a single land or day, but in all the world and for all time

WHERE WINTER IS SPRING

By the Rev. James W. Morris, D. D.

In Rio Grande the spring began about the middle of September. Long, chill rains, driven by blustering northeast winds, gradually passed into warm showers interspersed with sunshine; and then all nature awoke. I would find the air on some afternoons full of swallows, and as I watched them a great flock of squawking green parrots would dash by tumultuously overhead. I would know then that spring had come. Then some mornings I would go out into our garden and find that, "all unaware," the peach trees had begun to bloom and the first snowy blossoms to shine out in the green orange boughs.

October is charming, as a rule; it is doubtless our May. Everything wonderfully green. I did not remember from old days how many trees lose all their leaves during winter. Of course, foreign trees, like sycamores and chinaberry trees. of which the town is full, behave as they would at home. But a great many native trees, too, are bare for months. In October they not only leaf out, but bloom out. Nearly every one flowers. We have a large tree of the acacia species in our yard that was full in October of trumpet-shaped blue flowers. But also in October of trumpet-shaped blue flowers. Also in October all the evergreens, orange trees, wild figs and the many magnolia-like trees put on fresh green, and shine in their new verdant dress.

Our grounds began to beautify themselves early. All the lemon and orange trees covered themselves with white, filling the air with fragrance. A shapely orange tree, with its fresh green leaves, be-gemmed with pearly blossoms, is a handsome object, and when a considerable grove stands thus adorned, the effect is beautiful. After a little the ground beneath is spread with a snowy carpet. Then the plum trees added their quota of white purity and the quince bushes put out their delicate rose-like blossoms. Our one poor little apple tree has not yet made a start. It will perhaps delay till next month.

The flower-garden around the house has been much neglected: but we are finding that it must once have been carefully tended. Lately a great mass of weeds that I was about to root up has burst out in glorious poppies, crimson, blue, gold, delicate pink. What rich, luscious flowers they are! We have also had some fine iris of different colors. Very soon the whole place will be full of a ocmmon flower of many colors, which they call "saudade," i. e., remembrance. I never remember seeing it at home; it is a species of teasel, I believe. Then right before my window is a fine sweet-shrub tree that for weeks perfumed my room, and incidentally gave me a headache. Over by the hedge is an oleander which has been covered with pale-pink blossoms, while a little jasmine tree in front has finished its beauty time. It bears light blue and pure white blossoms in about equal number, and in its flowering time is a startling object. There were also geraniums and dahlias and some begonias. And so when we can put this garden in order, we should be able to make it very pretty. One of the students is experienced in cultivation of fruits and flowers, and he is determined to make the surroundings of the Seminary attractive. We have no white lilies—our Easter lilies—in our garden, though the whole neighborhood is full of them. In fact, the whole time makes one think of Easter at home, with its great services, its joyous hymns, its happy assurances of the grand new life, of which re-risen nature is a lovely yet ephemeral type.

These spring birds here interest me. One of the most attractive is the Brazilian robin, somewhat larger than our red-breast. He has a sweet, rippling song, which he never tires in singing. The notes come out in throbs. with a real thrilling ecstasy, and with no order, we think at first, till we listen and actch the rhythm. Is not the robin a kind of thrush? At least, this bird reminds me of the poet's famous description:

"Hark! . . . at the bent spray's edge
That's the wise thrush: he sings each song twice over,
Lest you should think he never could recapture
The first fine, careless rapture!"

We have a mite of a humming-bird that has built its ugly, fluffy nest up under the eaves of our porch. He apparently needs plenty of room for himself and his tiny mate. For this nest is a sizable affair, made out of stuff like cotton or wool. It swings in the air, and doubtless soothes to sleep the whole family of minute occupants. There are dear little song sparrows in great numbers in our grounds. For some time one of them had a way of giving a little silvery serenade each night as I lit my lamp. Perhaps the light shining on the tree awoke him. and made him think it daybreak. But after one song he doubtless discovered his mistake, and so thrusting head under wing, was off again to sleep. The "Bem te vi," that is, "I saw you," is a bold, noisy bird. He screams out his "bem te vi" three or four times, ending with a shrill, shrieking cry, and a long, high-keyed cackle. Mr. Thomas has such a number about his house that he complains of their noise.

After October comes a spell of hot, dry winds, and then hot, hot, hot, till we get around to April. Things dry up and parch very sorely; birds and flowers will lose their spring buoyancy: but then, if seasons are good, we shall have the summer fruits.

But we expect anything but a dry and uninteresting time. We expect to begin the building of our church next the Seminary in the next few weeks. And we plan to put our house in readiness to receive ten or twelve students next session, as well as enclose and improve our grounds. So that we expect to have an active and interesting summer. And we hope to have the church ready to be occupied by March 1, and our Seminary full of students, by God's favor through the prayers of our brethren.

Christmas Eve in Paris

By William C. Carl, Musical Director, Organist and Director of the Music, First Presbyterian Church, New York City.

Christmas Eve in Paris for centuries past has been a magic word. When the night arrives the boulevards are always filled with gayly decorated booths extending from the Place de la Republique to the Church of La Madeleine. Happy children in great numbers find what please them best at the Yuletide season, and wander from one booth to the next buying tempting articles. All Paris mingles with the throngs in brilliantly lighted thoroughfares until the time for the midnight mass. Then the churches are crowded with worshippers, offering their tribute to the Babe of Bethlehem.

The organ preludes are selected from the old Noels. many of which were arranged by Guilmant when he played at La Trinite—and there, in the organ gallery, the great master, surrounded by his pupils and friends, would play as if inspired, for Guilmant loved these old carols, and played them with a rare charm. First he would choose his Fantasie on two Christmas hymns, then in succession his Noel Brabacon, Noel Landuocien. Noel Ecossais and Noel Saboly. Next the choir would sing one from Brittany, then one from Normandy, and again one from Alsace, so dear to all French hearts. It did not take many minutes for the people to catch the Christmas spirit, for every one sings. Who in France does not know the charming Noels? No one who has attended can forget these services, for the people sing with rare enthusiasm and from the heart, producing a wonderful effect.

At St. Eustache, with Joseph Bonnet at the Grand organ; Notre Dame Cathedral, with Louis Vieren; The Madeleine, with Henri Dallier; St. Sulpice, with Charles Marie Widor, the old Noels, such as "Le petit Jesus," "Le Message des Anges," "Le Sommeil de l'enfant Jesus," "Les rois Magnes," "Le bel ange du ciel," are sung until the midnight hour approaches and mass begins. At its conclusion, the organ is again heard in another Noel as the people slowly leave the church to join the happy crowds in the boulevards—for is it not Christmas and a feast of great joy? Surely the French understand and appreciate the spirit of Christmas!

In The Stable

M. L. G.

Here let no rough wind intrude,
Here, though rude,
Hosts of angels bend and brood.

Bethlehem, when Joseph pled,
In sore dread,
Had no place for Mary's head.

Where within the cavern's gloom
Found they room
Did the Rose of Sharon bloom.

In the stall, the oxen, nigh,
See Him lie:
Earth's most lowly—heaven's Most High!

THE BIBLE—ANOTHER VERSION NEEDED.

Mr. Editor: About a year and a half ago, in an English publication, there was published an address by a Congregational layman on "The Public Worship of Our Churches." From start to finish it was good, but I was particularly impressed by what the speaker had to say as to the reading of the Word. "We assemble and meet together to hear His most Holy Word." It is a commonplace that the Authorized Version is a monument of the finest English that can be imagined. But it seems to me that when we praise it on that ground we are confusing two things. Are we reading an English classic, or are we reading an accurate translation of a Hebrew or Greek original? Surely the question is important. If the former is what we want—well, we have it. But if the latter—then in the Authorized Version we have it not. Let me take some instances at random typical of hundreds. Carlyle said that the expression in the book of Job descriptive of the war-horse, "Thou hast clothed his neck with thunder," was imagery which could hardly be surpassed. So it may be. I do not dispute it; but it appears from the Revised Version that the word translated "thunder" really means "a quivering mane," which is not nearly so good, but has the merit of being accurate. Again, it does not interest me, on Christmas Day, in the Lesson read in the parish church to hear these words, "Thou hast multiplied the nation and not increased the joy." It does not seem much to rejoice over that the joy has to be spread out thinner to go round. The Revised Version, leaving out the "not," makes sense, which the Authorized Version certainly does not: "Thou hast multiplied the nation; Thou hast increased their joy." Or, take the familiar Burial Service in which the minister is expected to say: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God"; Job, according to the Revised Version, says, "Without my flesh," "Apart from my flesh," shall I see God. There are scores of such instances.

But I have a graver complaint to make than that. We are so used to the Bible as our sacred book that we forget entirely how utterly foreign its modes of expression and its habits of thought are to ours. Some of you, by long and diligent study, are at home and move easily in its mazes, but, believe me, for the most part its real meanings are not only not understood; they are not understandable. You preachers are very fond of telling us how great a philosopher St. Paul was, and you read us long passages from his letters, expressed in tortuous, torrential sentences, imperfectly translated, and, as a rule, merely literal substitutions of English for the original Greek words. Because they are in the Bible we are supposed to understand them. Believe me, we do not. How many men, in an average congregation, would understand a passage from Locke, "On the Human Understanding," fired at them without warning and without note or comment? The question answers itself. Then, again, take the way we are put off by words which have changed their meaning since the Authorized Version was made. How many of us get the true meaning of the "Charity" passage in the First Epistle to the Corinthians? The only charity we know is that which doles out gifts to the needy, and that, neither in manner nor spirit, seems, as a rule, to deserve what St. Paul says of it. Brethren, we want a translation that will not hesitate to use modern language, understanded of the common people, and that will treat the original texts as a good translator would treat any classic. Let us have perspicuous sentences, expressed in clear, everyday language, and let the translator paraphrase if by so doing he can get the meaning better than by just substituting an English for a Hebrew or Greek word. For, after all, the meaning is the principal thing. "The sense of the Scripture is the Scripture."

Such a translation, by the very unfamiliarity of its language, would arouse in us an interest and a keenness of appreciation which we never feel today when the well-known words run on almost mechanically, ill-appreciated and ill-understood.

It will be a long time before such a translation comes. The mere money consideration will stop it, until some enlightened millionaire will put his wealth at the service of the Church. But even now there are many translations of parts of the Bible—Weymouth or Moffatt of the whole New Testament, Way of the Epistles, and others.

Speaking as a layman, "I am sure the laity would gladly welcome them."

This is rather a lengthy quotation, but I am sure it is quite worth while.

INFORMATION WANTED.

Mr. Editor: The Commission on Daily Vacation Bible Schools which was appointed last February by the Presiding Bishop and Council, for the purpose of investigating, evaluating and promoting the Daily Vacation Bible Schools in our Communion, is seeking information about the purposes, programs and success of the Vacation Schools held this past summer by our Church throughout the country at large. In forwarding this work, we must appeal to the clergy, Churchmen and Churchwomen for the desired information. If, therefore, you have had a vacation school in your parish, or have had any connection with one during any past summer, would you not communicate with the Commission, in order that our report might contain your experience with these schools? If you are conducting these schools, the Commission also stands ready to act as an exchange of ideas and methods, and we feel sure that you will find some help or suggestion from some of the original work being done by other workers in the field. In short, if you are, or have been, engaged in vacation church school work ,or are the least bit interested in the movement, would you not communicate with the Secretary, Commission Daily Vacatioon Bible School, 289 Fourth Avenue, Room 73, New York City.

Information Concerning Appointment of Army Chaplains

EXTRACTS FROM LETTER OF THE CHIEF OF CHAPLAINS TO BISHOP HARDING.

Recent action of the War Department has opened the way for many clergymen in the United States to receive commissions as chaplains in the Officers' Reserve Corps of the United States Army.

The Army of the United States consists of the Regular Army, the National Guard, while in the service of the United States, and the Organized Reserves, including the Officers' Reserve Corps.

The requirements for appointments as chaplains are simple. The general conditions are, citizenship in the United States or the Philippine Islands, applicant to be between twenty-one and ~~sixty~~ years of age, and duly accredited by and of good standing in some recognized religious denomination or organization, with two years of practical experience in ministerial work. Those without prior military service must undergo an examination which embraces a general knowledge of the principles of education, economics, sociology, and the writing of a brief thesis dealing with some phase of psychology relating to the work of the ministry.

The authorized grades in which appointments may be made in the chaplains' section of the Officers' Reserve Corps are, first lieutenant to lieutenant colonel, and promotions to the next higher grades, within the limits or rank stated, will be considered, in time of peace, upon application through military channels, after a commission has been held for at least one year in the lower grade.

The President, to the extent provided by the law, may from time to time order the reserve officers to active duty and for any period, but, except in time of national emergency expressly declared by Congress, no reserve chaplain shall be employed on active duty for more than fifteen days in any calendar year without his consent.

There are vacancies at this time for chaplains in the Officers' Reserve Corps in many sections of the United States, and clergymen who may be interested should apply to the Adjutant General of the Army or to the Chief of Chaplains for blank forms of application and such further information as they may desire.

With all your good desires and grand intentions, it is well to remember that obedience is ever better than sacrifice.—Selected.

THE PRESIDING BISHOP AND COUNCIL

Transact Much Business at Important Meeting

THE regular meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council and its six departments and various committees connected therewith was held in New York City on December 12 to 15, inclusive, with twenty-one members in attendance.

In his opening address the President spoke of the visit which he had been able to make to the churches in the various parts of the country, and of the great interest and spirit of co-operation which he found everywhere he went. The Council appreciated the value of such visits and felt that the President should continue them, taking with him other members of the Council and the executive staff in the hope that during the next triennium he would be able to visit the entire domestic missionary field.

The Department of Missions reported on the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society. As far as can be ascertained, the Centennial was very generally observed in churches all over the United States and extended also to the mission fields, reports coming in of services having been held in our churches in China, Japan and Brazil. The exercises provided for the Sunday schools were used in at least three thousand schools: the pageant in at least fifteen hundred parishes. The offerings already exceed $40,000, and were received not only from this country, but from our Church in Florence, in Tokyo, Japan, and in Shanghai, China, where the congregation of the Church of Our Saviour in Shanghai presented to the Bishop for the Centennial Fund a lot valued at $1,500. The largest single offering received to date is that of $8,000 from the Church of the Epiphany, New York City. One of the objectives was the securing of one hundred qualified missionaries for service at home and abroad before Easter of 1922. Up to date seventy of these missionaries have been secured and sent to the fields. Mention was made of two notable mass meetings, one held in Chicago, where over 3,500 people were present, and one in Providence, R. I. The total expenditure, including all the publicity, printed matter, and other expenses, amounted to $18,800, being $1,200 less than the amount estimated.

The presence of Dr. R. B. Teusler, of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, enabled the department to go very fully into the question of the plans for the new St. Luke's International Hospital, Tokyo. The members of the department availed themselves of the opportunity to ask many questions of Dr. Teusler in order to get a full knowledge of the plans.

The Rev. A. A. Gilman, D. D., President of Boone University, Wuchang, in the District of Hankow, was given an opportunity at the meeting of the Department of Missions to present plans for the enlargement of this important University. The Council voted to request the Committee on Priority of Funds to place on the priority list the following needs of Boone University, which are already included in the survey:

4 acres of land	$35,000
Science Building	50,000
Foreign residence	8,000
Water supply	2,500
	$95,500

The congregation at Glenn's Ferry, in the District of Idaho, has been working very hard to secure a place of meeting, and have succeeded in raising the sum of $2,798, which has been subscribed locally for this work.

The Council heard with interest of the efforts of St. Stephen's College and Trinity College to raise endowment funds for their institutions, and expressed its cordial sympathy and good wishes for the success of their efforts.

The Executive Secretary of the Department of Religious Education has made a careful study of the organizations of young people throughout the Church. The matter was discussed by the department and reported to the Council.

The department reported the organization of the new Commission on Religion in the Home, with the Rev. James Lawrence Ware, of Kingston, Pa., as chairman. The work of this Commission is to study the cultivation of religion in the home by family prayers, devotional reading, observance of anniversaries and by all methods that will bring a recognition of vital religion in the home.

Some comparative statistics presented by the department showing the achievements of the department in the last two years are most interesting.

1919.	1921.
1 student inquiry station.	7 student inquiry stations.
2 week-day schools co-operating with public schools.	30 week-day schools co-operating with public school.
2 Normal schools.	18 Normal schools.
8 Summer schools.	27 Summer schools.
About 50 men and women associated with the work of the department, giving volunteer service.	Over 200 men and women associated with the work of the department, giving volunteer service.

The Sunday school pupils increased 24,000 in 1920 over 1919; the teachers, 1,700.

The Council, on the recommendation of the department, added the following as additional members of the department: The Rev. Phillips E. Osgood, of Minneapolis, Minn.; the Rev. Lester E. Sunderland, of New York, and the Rev. James Lawrence Ware, of Kingston, Pa.

The Department of Christian Social Service asked that Mrs. Mary K. Simkhovitch be elected an additional member of the department, which was done.

While the Council was holding its meeting in Washington last July a very cordial invitation was given to it, over the signature of the Bishop of Washington, to consider the question of making its permanent headquarters in that city. This was referred to a committee of laymen, which reported that while the Canon did not authorize the Council to make a permanent change of either the ecclesiastical or the business headquarters of the Church, that such a step would, in the opinion of the committee, require action of the General Convention, and that other considerations made the committee feel that it should report adversely. To quote only two reasons: the bank facilities which the Council now has in New York City are of great value to the Church and would probably not be available if the change were made. As a shipping center and a center for purchasing supplies, New York is superior to Washington, both of which matters are of importance to the Church.

The Council adjourned to meet again on February 8 and 9, having definitely voted that its meetings should cover two whole days each time.

The Department of Missions.

The Department of Missions, which met in New York on December 13, 1921, had the pleasure of appointing five new missionaries to the field and giving permission to the Bishops to employ five others. These missionaries went to Arkansas, Fond du Lac, North Carolina, Philippines, Porto Rico, Cuba and Tokyo. This makes seventy new missionaries who have gone to the field on account of the one hundred which have been asked for as one of the objects of the Centennial celebration.

The department expressed regret at the resignation of the Rev. Allan L. Burleson as rector of Christ Church, Mexico City. He has been transferred to the Diocese of Los Angeles. Mr. Burleson, who, as every one knows, is a brother of the Bishop of South Dakota, and whose father and five brothers, all clergymen, have done service in the missionary field, has been in Mexico for thirteen years. The department placed on record its great appreciation of his service and prayers for his success in his new field.

In order to conserve the health of our missionaries in China, and on the earnest recommendation of the Bishops, the department made provision for the screening of the mission residences in that field.

Mrs. T. W. Bickett, at the request of the Woman's Auxiliary, was appointed representative of the department on the Woman's Work Committee of the Commission on Inter-racial Co-operation.

The department appointed delegates to the Foreign Missions Conference and Home Missions Council, which will be held in January.

Many important matters were discussed and made recommendation to the Presiding Bishop and Council.

Responsibility creates manhood. No character can progress ithout it. The wise man courts it; the fool shirks it. Responsibility keeps pace with spiritual development. God fits the back to the burden and the burden to the back. On the other hand, he who runs from opportunity and quails before responsibility begins forthwith to die interiorly. Mere occupation is of small avail as a creative force. To occupation must be added moral purpose before activity is worthy of true manhood, and of course the essence of moral purpose is unselfishness.

It is plainly apparent to any thoughtful person, then, that the necessity of recognizing stewardship is written indelibly in the constitution of human nature. To have drunk deep at the fountain of responsibility is to have tasted of the serenest, purest joy that life affords. Man began to be when God appointed him a steward—for that is the bright side of the otherwise sad story of the garden and its fruits. Human development marched onward as responsibility was enlarged and accepted.—Bishop Brent.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

There is nothing in the doings of today that is more encouraging to one who is watching for the coming of the Kingdom than the activities of such organizations as Rotary and Kiwanis Clubs.

These bodies are constantly doing things that would never have been considered at all as objects for groups of men of all religious faiths who are banded together primarily for social intercourse.

Their accomplishments are worthy of any Church society.

Last summer in one city a baseball game was staged between the two clubs (Kiwanis and Rotary), which netted nearly three thousand dollars to the relief of the poor.

The Rotary Club of Richmond, Va., is now planning the building of a gymnasium for a boys' club to cost $15,000, while from Washington comes the news that the Rotary Club plans to give, as it did last year, a beautiful Christmas entertainment for the needy children of Washington in the Willard Hotel ball-room, on the 21st of December. The entertainment will last all day, and arrangements for certain groups of children will be made so that all will be comfortably cared for. The children will be met at the door by members of the committee, and from that time until they leave every possible attention will be given them. The Rotary Club will provide automobiles, omnibuses or car fare for all children desiring to attend. Individual presents, beautiful music, a Christmas tree, special lighting, and Santa Claus will be some of the attractions. Those in charge will sacrifice everything to the happiness and comfort of the children, and as usual with Rotary Club affairs, a splendid spirit will prevail. The Rev. C. T. Warner, rector of St. Alban's Church, and a Rotarian of Washington is one of the Floor Committee, and will be at the Willard all day on December 21 to help make the affair a day of happiness for every one.

We mention these things because of their Christian significance.

These organizations do not operate in the name of Christ, but they are inspired by His influence, and it is the same way with many other movements today that do not bear His name. There are many convincing proofs that there is more of Christianity in our communities than there ever was before, so let us look into the face of the coming year with confidence and love, striving to see better things and to do greater deeds for the Master.

BEGINNING AT THE RIGHT PLACE.

News comes from West Virginia that the girls in the high school at Point Pleasant, under the leadership of one of their teachers, who is a graduate of Goucher College, have adopted a set of resolutions in regard to school dressing for girl students, calling a halt on extreme shortness of skirts or thinness of material.

The action of these girls so impressed the State Board of Education that they issued the resolutions adopted as a recommendation to principals of schools throughout the State.

A great deal has been said and written about modern feminine attire, but the only way that it can really be corrected is to get the women themselves to take it up.

When young girls realize the situation and take the matter in hand, there will be no trouble in bringing about whatever reforms are necessary.

The short skirt is one of those many things which had a good and useful origin, but has been abused.

We quote the following account of the reason for the adoption of the short skirt from one who had a share in it:

"Whims of fashion are always inconsistent and illogical, according to the masculine sex. Yet the adoption of the very short Parisian skirt, which has long been worn here despite ridicule, in Paris had a serious object in view.

" 'Ah! you Americans say much about our short skirts, but it was not because we were immodest that we made our skirts so narrow and short,' said a French bride yesterday to Miss Alfrieda M. Mosher, of the Y. W. C. A. in Boston. 'It was to save and win the war that we saved and skimped cloth. It was just one of the sacrifices which we of France made. We sacrificed all things during those terrible years. Setting a new style was furtherest from our mind.'

"The speaker was one of the 3,622 war brides that the Young Women's Christian Association officially chaperoned on the trip across. Many of them have turned to the social and educational facilities of the Association near their new homes."

THE STRIKE IN THE PACKING PLANTS.

In view of the fact that we quoted two weeks ago from a press dispatch in the New York Times the account of the acceptance of the meat-packing employes of the wage cut put into operation by the employers, we here quote the account given by the Survey.

This latter magazine always tries to be fair to both sides, but is not afraid to tell the truth, no matter what large interests it may affect.

It says:

Led by John Fitzpatrick and William Z. Foster, the twelve international unions having jurisdiction over workers in the packing industry carried through a successful organizing campaign in the fall of 1918. This was in line with the various concerted movements in the poorly organized basic industries, notably the shipping and railroad industries and later the steel industry. When a majority of the workers were organized the labor leaders demanded recognition, but were ignored by the packers. They then took their grievances to Secretary of War Baker and Secretary of Labor Wilson. These Cabinet officers prevailed upon the employers to submit all contentions to an umpire. Judge Samuel Alschuler was selected, and both sides signed an agreement to recognize the jurisdiction of this tribunal until a year after the signing of peace in Europe.

Last March, however, the packers arbitrarily declared a wage reduction, refusing further to submit to the authority of Judge Alschuler, notwithstanding that the agreement did not expire until September 15. On protest of the unions and after conference with the Secretary of Labor, an agreement was reached that the men would accept an eight-cent hourly reduction, on condition that the packers promise not to scrap the arbitration machinery. In June the packers petitioned Judge Alschuler for an additional wage reduction. They were represented by a corps of able corporation lawyers, economists and statisticians. The workers were represented by Cornelius Hayes, president, and Dennis Lane, secretary, of the Butcher Workmen, with the technical assistance of the Labor Bureau. Inc. Judge Alschuler ruled that previous wage reductions represented "practically 19 per cent. reduction from the top of the wages," and that a further reduction was not justified by the data presented on behalf of the packers.

Following this decision, the Armour Company announced that it would introduce "industrial democracy" in its plants via the American employe representation plan. The other large firms, with the exception of the Morris Company, followed a similar course. Sensing in this action a serious situation, the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America called a conference of local representatives in Omaha for August 15. At this gathering the international officials were instructed to ask for a renewal of the arbitration agreement. Although the packers granted them a courteous hearing, they failed to respond to the proposal. A strike vote was taken, which resulted in a 90 per cent. favorable return. (No public announcement was made of the number voting.) With this mandate in their pocket, the Butcher Workmen called a meeting of international officials of other unions having members who are employed in the stock yards and packing plants. After mature deliberation it was concluded that abstract opposition to "company unions" was not a sufficiently tangible issue to grip the imagination of the rank and file. Under the wage reduction 65 per cent. of packing-house workers will be receiving a weekly wage of $18, and the workers decided to strike rather than submit without protest.

THE SOCIAL SERVICE COUNCIL OF ADVICE

At Initial Meeting Adopts as Slogan: "Thought Before Action, But Always Action."

The Council of Advice of the National Department of Christian Social Service held its initial meeting at Chicago, Ill., on December 6, 7 and 8. This is the Council which was organized last summer at the suggestion of the National Conference of Church Social Workers held in Milwaukee in June, an informal body gathered by the Executive Secretary to enable the department to come into closer touch with the whole of his field.

The meeting was held under the direction of the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, Executive Secretary of the department, who presided during the sessions. The following members were present: Miss Anne T. Vernon, Field Secretary of the Department of Social Service, Diocese of Rhode Island, from the First Province; the Rev. Charles K. Gilbert, Executive Secretary of the Social Service Commission, Diocese of New York, and the Rev. Samuel Tyler, D. D., rector of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, N. Y., from the Second Province; the Rev. Robert P. Kreitler, rector of St. Luke's Church, Scranton, Pa., from the Third Province; the Rev. Lewis N. Taylor, rector of All Saints' Church, Roanoke Rapids, N. C., from the Fourth Province; the Rev. Charles L. Street, Superintendent of the City Mission in Chicago, Ill., from the Fifth Province; and the Rev. C. Rankin Barnes, rector of St. James' Church, South Pasadena, Cal., from the Eighth Province. The Rev. Mr. Street was chosen as secretary.

During the three days there was detailed discussion of the following points contained in the agenda which had been prepared in advance by Dean Lathrop:

1. The Function of the Council of Advice.
2. The Scope and Place of Christian Social Service in the Church.
3. The Program for the Winter.
4. Relations in Social Service Work Between Diocese, Province and Department.
5. Plans for the National Conference of Church Social Workers in Providence, R. I., June 19-21.
6. Plans and Program for Social Service Study in Summer Schools.
7. A Church Social Workers' Bulletin.

The Conference began by formulating the statement that "the social task of the Church" is to seek through education and inspiration to bring the individual and the community to apply the principles of Jesus Christ to the relationships which men bear to one another. The principles of Jesus Christ must be made to dominate the home, the daily work, recreation, industry and political life."

The Social Service organizations of the Church must make it their work to bring people to recognize this responsibility and to carry out the program. A national program for Social Service was worked out under four heads: education, vital problems, organized activities and co-ordination of Social Service activities both within and without the Church.

The work of education, for instance, would include such manifold fields as the arranging of discussion groups in parishes, sermons and addresses, list of Social Service books, legislative information, regional conferences, and Social Service studies in summer schools.

The slogan which the Conference adopted, "Thought before action ,but always action," would apply particularly to the problems which were listed as necessary for study with view to action. Among these were social problems such as drug addiction, liquor traffic, prostitution, gambling, lawlessness and lynching, prisons, marriage and divorce, housing, use of leisure time, moving pictures and rural problems. Among industrial problems would be unemployment, child labor, collective bargaining, women in industry, and co-operation of employees in industrial management.

The following list of activities was suggested for the work of parish and diocesan Social Service commissions:

Parish.

It was decided that the first step in the parish is to organize a Social Service Committee which should relate itself to such appropriate parish organizations as the Girls' Friendly Society, the Woman's Auxiliary, the Church Service League, the Church School Service League, and other young people's societies, the Church Mission of Help, Brotherhood of St. Andrew, of men's clubs, etc.

The work of this committee should be:

1. To organize discussion groups in the parish. Dean Lathrop's book, "The Social Apportunity of the Churchman," is a good text-book.
2. To co-operate in the work of Church institutions, homes for aged persons, homes for boys and girls, Church hospitals, city mission societies, etc.
3. To co-operate with secular welfare agencies through—
   (a) Having members on boards of directors.
   (b) Friendly visiting, especially from the religious point of view.
   (c) Organizing the trained social workers and providing for them an annual Corporate Communion, and annual Quiet Day, and such other meetings as local conditions suggest.
4. To keep in touch with members of their own parish who are in institutions, either Church or secular, and to co-operate with the child-placing organizations to find Church homes for Church children.

Diocese.

It was recognized that the Diocese is the logical unit for the organization and stimulation of Christian Social Service. The work of the Diocesan Social Service Commission should include such activities as the following:

1. To help the parishes carry out the program outlined above.
2. To keep the people informed about legislative matters.
3. To get people interested in Social Service to attend the summer conferences.
4. To provide a lending library of Social Service books.
5. To keep a list of Church people engaged in active social work and others vitally interested.
6. To study the institutions in their diocese, both Church and secular, and ascertain:
   (a) Whether or not the institutions that the community needs are being provided.
   (b) Whether the existing institutions have wants that they can help supply.
   (c) What are the standards in the Church institutions?
7. To study conditions in the public institutions, especially county jails, county hospitals and almshouses.
8. To organize a speakers' bureau.
9. To provide a column of Social Service news for the diocesan paper .
10. To keep in touch with the National Department, the annual Conference of Church Social Workers and the National Conference of Social Work.

The Council recommended to the Department of Christian Social Service of the Presiding Bishop and Council that they draw up for presentation to General Convention a statement regarding the position of the Church in relation to the social problems of the day, as affirmed by the Lambeth Report and Resolution.

Provinces.

The following action was taken with regard to the Social Service Departments of the provinces:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this body that the National Social Service Secretary and the Secretary of the New York Social Service Commission take steps to secure the appointment on Provincial Commissions of representatives of the respective Diocesan Social Service Commissions;

That measures be taken by this committee to secure the enactment by the provinces of a uniform canon or ordinance covering this matter;

That the Provincial Commissions thus created be urged (1) to promote the program of the National Department, and (2) to provide Social Service Conferences in connection with the annual Synods;

That the Provincial Commissions take it as one of their functions to stimulate and strengthen the Diocesan Commissions within the province which may need such assistance.

One of the delightful experiences of the Conference was the presence at the evening meeting on December 7 of Dr. Graham Taylor, the veteran head of Chicago Commons, who gave a thrilling account of the growth of enthusiasm for social righteousness within the Christian Church during the last forty years.

Members of the Conference made their Corporate Communion at Trinity Church, Highland Park, on the morning of December 8, Dean Lathrop being the celebrant.

The meeting of the Council was marked by a fine spirit of fellowship, a broad will to understand, and an ardent feeling of responsibility to the Master, as well as by the fact that practically every section of the country was represented.

Meeting of Executive Committee of Diocesan Missionary Society.

A regular meeting of the Executive Committee of the Diocesan Missionary Society was held in St. Paul's Parish House, Richmond, with a good attendance of members. The meeting was devoted largely to appropriations to the salaries of missionaries of the society for the year 1922.

The beginning of 1922 will show the Diocesan Missionary Society making appropriations to the salaries of thirty-three white clergy, two laymen, six colored clergy, twenty-two white women workers and ten colored; a total of seventy-three missionaries at work in the Diocese. The usual appropriations were made to the Blue Ridge Industrial School and for the support of the Diocesan paper, "Forward." The Treasurer's report showed that the total expenditures for the year 1921, when the December payments on the stipends of missionaries shall have been paid, will amount to between $48,000 and $49,000.

The vestry of Pohick and Olivet Churches notified the society that they would not ask for a renewal of appropriation toward the support of their minister after January 1.

The Rev. B. D. Chambers, of Millwood, was elected a member of the Executive Committee to succeed the Rev. Giles B. Palmer, who resigned on account of removing from the Valley Convocation.

The Executive Committee adopted new by-laws to govern its work, the chief change being the appointment of four regular meetings each year instead of five at present, the meetings being held on the second Tuesday in January, April, June and October.

Conference of Church Schools.

The third annual Conference of Virginia Church schools and Virginia schools under Church influence is called by the Church Schools Committee of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education of Virginia for Monday, January 23, 1922. As hitherto, the conference will be held in the parish hall of Grace Church, Richmond, Bishop Brown presiding. It will extend from 3:30 P. M. to 10:30 P. M.

Invitations are being sent out to members of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, members of the Committee on Schools and Colleges of the Provincial Board of Religious Education, together with members of school boards and of the administrative and teaching staffs of the schools in this and selected schools in adjoining dioceses.

The main direction of the conference will doubtless be toward practical accomplishment in developing the curriculum of religious education of our schools along common lines not only of scholastic requirement, but, even more important, of dynamic spiritual values. The inauguration of these annual conferences has greatly stimulated the cause of religious education in our schools.

Meeting of Diocesan Board of Religious Education.

A meeting of the Board of Religious Education of the Diocese was held in Richmond on Tuesday evening, December 13. The Rev. Messrs. W. D. Smith, D. D., of St. Mark's Church, Richmond, Percy F. Hall, of St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, and B. D. Chambers, of Cunningham Chapel Parish, Clarke County, were elected to membership on the Board. Action was taken on the following matters:

The calling of the third annual Conference of Headmasters of Church Schools to be held in Richmond in January.

The appointment of committees in regard to the Summer School for Workers to be held in Charlottesville next summer.

The appointment of a committee to establish a lending library of books on pedagogy and other matters of Sunday school instruction.

The appointment of a committee to continue during this year the holding of conferences on Life Service in different parts of the Diocese.

Pay-up Week.

A number of parishes in the Diocese have adopted the plan of having a pay-up Sunday in which all of their people are urged to pay up all unpaid pledges of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

The parish treasurers throughout the Diocese have been notified that the books of the Diocesan Treasurer will be kept open until Janaury 7 in order to receive any belated remittances on the payment of the 1921 quota. All rectors and treasurers are urged to secure the payment of all pledges and to make remittance as promptly as possible to the Treasurer of the Diocese.

N.-W. C. Pledges for 1922.

While the reports of pledges for 1922 from such parishes as have reported are most encouraging, the Diocesan Treasurer is still unable to make a report for the Diocese. Every rector and parish treasurer is most strongly urged to send in at once a full report of pledges for their N.-W. C. quota for 1922.

Promising Colored Mission: Bishop Brown visited John Moncure Chapel, in Stafford County, Rev. Charles L. Somers, rector, on Wednesday, December 7, and confirmed a class of seven. The work at this colored mission is taking on new life under its present rector, and gives promise of much growth and success.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

The Rev. Robert C. Jett D. D. Bishop

Trinity Church, Rocky Mount (the Rev. W. T. Roberts, rector): This congregation sustained an irreparable loss in the death, on Friday, December 16, of the Hon. Edward Watts Saunders, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Judge Saunders spent a busy and valuable life, doing honor to, and many times being honored by, both his State and his Church. As a statesman he served eight terms in the House of Delegates, during the greater part of this time being Speaker of the House; several years as circuit judge; seven times elected a member of Congress; one year Chief Justice of the Virginia Court of Appeals. As a Churchman he was a most useful and faithful member of Trinity Church, for many years a member of its vestry. He also represented the Diocese of Southern Virginia at several sessions of the General Convention.

Christ Church, Blacksburg (the Rev. W. B. Lee, Jr., rector): On Tuesday evening, November 22, this congregation opened its new parish house with an old-fashioned and enjoyable "housewarming." The property, which adjoins the church and was formerly a residence, has been considerably remodeled for its new uses, and contains an auditorium seating one hundred persons, and rooms for Sunday school and all parish purposes. The Episcopal Club held its first smoker in the parish house on December 2, the Rev. Karl M. Block, of St. John's, Roanoke, being the speaker of the evening. A chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has been recently organized by students and members of the faculty of Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

St. John's, Roanoke (the Rev. Karl M. Block, rector): On Sunday, November 27, a beautiful memorial window was unveiled in this church, in memory of Dr. William Henry Harrison, who was a well-known figure in Virginia history and a Confederate soldier. This memorial window was the gift of relatives.

R. E. Lee Memorial, Lexington (the Rev. Churchill Gibson, rector), has sustained a great loss in the death of Colonel N. Beverley Tucker, of the Virginia Military Institute, and for many years senior warden of the church, the duties of which office he discharged with unusual fidelity and efficiency.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Impressive Service in the Cathedral.

A special service of prayer and thanksgiving, to mark the birthday of His Majesty, Alexander, King of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, was held at the Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, on Saturday afternoon, December 17. This service was by the arrangement of the Bishop of Washington and the dean and chapter of the Cathedral, in response to a request of His Excellency Slavak Growitch, Minister at Washington of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes. The music of the service, which was rendered by the full Cathedral choir, included, in addition to that provided for in the service of evening prayer, the Serbian national anthem. The Bishop, the Dean and Canon Devries conducted this service, to which all were invited. The Serbian flag was carried in the procession of choir and clergy as well as the Cathedral banner.

The Christmas play at the National Cathedral School for Girls was very beautifully and successfully staged on Saturday, December 10, in Whitby Hall before a large and responsive audience. The program was begun by a short play entitled "A Christmas Reverie," in which there were only three characters. This served as a fitting way to prepare the audience for the very spiritual and symbolic play which followed, and which was the principal feature of the evening. This play was Elizabeth McFadden's dramatization of that much loved story, "Why the Chimes Rang," by Raymond Alden. Girls of the school formed the entire caste, and the work was so well done that one could find little to distinguish it from the work of professional players.

Children's Service at Epiphany: A new type of Christmas celebration for the children at Epiphany Church took place on Sunday afternoon, December 18, when a special Christmas manger service was held and an address made by Dr. Freeman. The children brought gifts to the manger which had been placed on the chancel between the choir stalls, and these gifts were later given to those who needed them.

A program of unusual interest and in keeping with the spirit of the Christmastide was given at the Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, on Sunday, December 18, when Mr. Edgar Priest, Cathedral organist, was heard in recital by a large number of people.

Bishops Tendered Luncheon by Women of the Diocese.

One thousand women, members of the Women's League for Patriotic Service and their friends, tendered Bishop Manning and the two Suffragan Bishops a luncheon at the Hotel Biltmore. Rarely has there been gathered in one place so many Church women of ability, of influence, and more than all, of a mind to work and not just talk. Reports of work done were read during the luncheon. This work included hospital visitation and the distribution of literature; the Greer House, which does much for young women who are students: and the last development, which is work for former service men, especially such as are ill. The project now is to provide a Greer House near to Columbia University, expressly for women students.

Bishop Manning praised the work of the League, its aims and its achievements, but launched into larger plans. His greatest and strongest plea was for religion in the home.

He expressed the hope that the nave of the Cathedral might soon be built, and pledged himself and the Diocese to hard work for missions, the meeting of the full apportionment. He urged women to interview nation-wide parish committees about the progress of the apportionment in the parish in which they have the closest interest.

He thanked God for the Washington Conference, and for the part our nation is taking. Finally, he pointed out that leadership in present world plans is from the English-speaking peoples of the earth, and especially did he want it borne in mind that the Church is the great religious expression and effort of this race. He paid honor to all other forces, but gloried in these.

Christ Church, the Rev. Dr. John R. Atkinson, rector, occupies a strategic corner on upper Broadway. The property is worth $1,000,000. On the north there was built many years ago, when large congregations came to hear the Rev. Dr. Jacob Shipman, father of Bishop Shipman, a wing extending out from the body of the church. It has long been useless for seating congregations, and is now to be torn down. Upon the site adjoining the church is to be erected an office building. Money to build it is supplied by business, and rentals of $15,000 a year are to be paid for twenty-five years. Renewal privileges are granted, the whole to run for sixty-seven years. The property has upon it a debt of $80,000. The plan will pay off the church debt and provide an endowment.

The Social Service Commission of the Diocese of New York has been granted the use of the parish house of St. Augustine's Chapel, in East Houston Street, a part of Trinity Parish, for its Americanization work. This work will include institutional work, especially for foreign-born women. A professional canvasser is now making a study of the field. The Commission has nothing to do with the chapel itself, and the spiritual work long carried on in it.

The Rev. Roland C. Ormsbee, of the Diocese of Newark, has been received by Bishop Manning, of the Diocese of New York, and placed in charge of the new St. Bartholomew's work at White Plains, succeeding in that work Bishop Lloyd, who is now Suffragan. Mr. Ormsbee was formerly rector of St. Paul's Parish, Newark, but resigned and entered war work, being appointed army chaplain a few days before the Armistice was signed. He spent a year in France, however, under the "Y."

The Churchwoman's Club.

The first organization meeting of the Churchwoman's Club was held at the home of Mrs. Richard Aldrich, New York City, November 29. Over forty members were present, and regrets expressing interest in the plans for the club were received from fifty more.

Any one who wishes to obtain further information about this club is asked to apply to Mrs. Malcolm Macfarlane, 8 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City.

Good Results From Campaign.

A church attendance campaign, in which all of the Episcopal churches of the city of Wilmington took part, was put on during the Advent season, with splendid results. Very liberal and well-written display advertisements, carried in the local newspapers, were a feature of the campaign. Church attendance pledge cards were distributed throughout the city. The campaign was modeled after similar campaigns conducted in the past by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

Churchman's Club Has Interesting Discussion.

At a recent meeting of the Churchmen's Club of Wilmington, a debate was held on the question: "Resolved, that tithing is obligatory on the Church of today." A leading lawyer of the city took the affirmative, while the negative side of the question was defended by a prominent business man. At this same meeting it was decided to make plans for a suitable celebration of the anniversary of Bishop Darst's consecration. This club is made up of the laymen of the Church in the city of Wilmington.

A number of missions have recently been held in East Carolina. Bishop Darst preached a three-day mission in the Church of the Advent, Williamston. The Rev. W. R. Noe, Executive Secretary of the Diocese, held one in St. Thomas' Church, Windsor. The Rev. F. D. Dean was the preacher in a week's mission at Calvary Church, Warsaw. The Rev. J. E. W. Cook held a mission in St. Paul's Church, Clinton.

Delaware Moves Forward.

The Delaware Clericus met in Christ Church rectory, Christiana Hundred, December 13, as guests of the Rev. Frederick T. Ashton. Reports of the annual canvass indicated large increases in several parishes and missions, notably in Claymont, Smyrna, Middletown, Seaford, Laurel, Georgetown, and Immanuel Church, Wilmington. A resolution was adopted expressing the gratification felt by the clergy of Delaware in the fact that the Rev. T. Getz Hill, rector of St. Peter's Church, Smyrna, and the Rev. Richard W. Trapnell, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Wilmington, would remain in the Diocese, both having recently declined calls to parishes outside the State. The examining chaplains, with the Bishop, were asked to arrange a special course of study for the clergy of the Diocese. The secretary of the Clericus, the Rev. Charles A. Rantz, was appointed custodian of lists of such church furnishings as are no longer needed in parishes and are available for use elsewhere. Plans were announced for an enlarged Peninsula Summer School, which will be held next summer at Rehoboth, Del., beginning Wednesday, June 21.

Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral Instituted.

On Sunday, December 18, the Rev. Francis B. Blodgett, late Professor of Old Testament at the General Theological Seminary, was instituted by Bishop J. C. Ward as Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Erie. The Bishop celebrated the Holy Communion and preached the sermon. In the afternoon the choir rendered the "Messiah." At the evening service, which was preceded by an organ recital, the new dean preached the sermon.

Russian Church Assists in Service: At a recent visit of the Bishop to St. Lawrence's Church, Osceola Mills (the Rev. C. S. Brown, rector), the priest of the Russian Orthodox Church brought his choir and congregation to participate in the services. The Russian choir added to the solemnity of the service by rendering three anthems.

Collect for Christmas Day.

Almighty God, Who hast given us Thy only begotten Son to take our nature upon Him, and as at this time to be born of a pure virgin; Grant that we being regenerate, and made Thy children by adoption and grace, may daily be renewed by Thy Holy Spirit; through the same our Lord Jesus Christ, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the same Spirit ever, one God, world without end. Amen.

Collect for First Communion Christmas Day.

O God, Who maketh us glad with the yearly remembrance of the birth of Thine only Son, Jesus Christ: Grant that as we joyfully receive Him for our Redeemer, so we may with sure confidence behold Him when He shall come to be our Judge, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

Collect for St. Stephen's Day.

Grant, O Lord, that, in all our sufferings here upon earth for the testimony of Thy truth, we may steadfastly look up to heaven, and by faith behold the glory that shall be revealed; and, being filled with the Holy Ghost, may learn to love and bless our persecutors by the example of Thy first martyr, St. Stephen, who prayed ofr his murderers to Thee, O blessed Jesus, Who standest at the right hand of God, to succor all those who suffer for Thee, our only Mediator and Advocate. Amen.

Collect for First Sunday After Christmas.

Almighty God, Who hast given us Thy only begotten Son to take our nature upon Him, and as at this time to be born of a pure virgin; Grant that we, being regenerate and made Thy children by adoption and grace, may daily be renewed by Thy Holy Spirit; through the same our Lord Jesus Christ, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the same Spirit ever, one God, world without end. Amen.

Collect for St. John the Evangelist's Day.

Merciful Lord, we beseech Thee to cast Thy bright beams of light upon Thy Church, that it, being instructed by the doctrine of Thy blessed apostle and evangelist, St. John, may so walk in the light of Thy truth that it may at length attain to everlasting life; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for the Innocents' Day.

O Almighty God, Who out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast ordained strength and made infants to glorify Thee by their deaths; Mortify and kill all vices in us, and so strengthen us by Thy grace that by the innocency of our lives and constancy of our faith even unto death we may glorify Thy holy name; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Incarnation.

Wilbur Fisk Tillett.

O Son of God incarnate,
O Son of Man divine,
In whom God's glory dwelleth,
In whom man's virtues shine;
God's light to earth Thou bringest
To drive sin's night away,
And, through Thy life so radiant,
Earth's darkness turns to day.

O Mind of God incarnate,
O Thought in flesh enshrined,
In human form Thou speakest
To men the Father's mind:
God's thought to earth Thou bringest
That men in Thee may see
What God is like, and, seeing,
Think God's thoughts after Thee.

O Heart of God incarnate,
Love-bearer to mankind,
From Thee we learn what love is,
In Thee love's ways we find:
God's love to earth Thou bringest
In living deeds that prove
How sweet to serve all others,
When we all others love.

O Will of God incarnate,
So human, so divine,
Free wills to us Thou givest
That we may make them Thine:
God's will to earth Thou bringest
That all who would obey
May learn from Thee their duty,
The truth, the life, the way.

The Spirit of Christmas.

On this day we shall not argue about the existence of God. I know how tremendous is the mystery. The simplest words are the hardest to define. Let me hear you define "I," or "you," or "He," or "Live," or "Love," or "be," or "is." Each attempt will lead you into profoundities of meta-physical subtility far beyond your depth. I know how theologians attempting to define God seem to cloud the visions at times. Big words are impressive, but they usually conceal rather than reveal. Every thoughtful person, when he says "God," is conscious of a touch of reverence upon his mind. Is there a God?

"Brief and powerless is man's life; on him and all his race the slow, sure doom falls pitiless and dark. Blind to good and evil, reckless of destruction, omnipotent matter rolls on its way." That is the sad chant of one who says there is no God. While some are saying, "I believe in the Father Almighty," others are muffling their voice and saying, "I used to believe in God, the Father Almighty."

That is the pathetic admission of grown-up skepticism. "Sometimes," says Darwin, "I feel a warm sense of a personal God, and then it goes away!" But the Christian says, "God is spirit; and yet the only way you can ever know spirit is when it is in a body.

Studying Angelo's frescoes on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel in Rome, the visitor strains to see, but finally gives up in despair; then a guide lends him a mirror, and looking down into it, he finds all the marvelous design and color wonderfully reflected. For ages men strained their eyes to catch a glimpse of God, but the light was a half-light; they caught but unsatisfactory glimpses. Then God sent His Son, the express image of His person, and brightness of His glory, and we beheld in Him the unspeakable glory of God, and, beholding, are changed into the same image from glory unto glory, even as by the Lord the Spirit.

There are other mountain peaks in history, hills which catch the light of the sun before the valleys catch it, and distribute the streams that flow, from the supernatural, but Christ is the Great Divide of human history. All divine life finds highest expression there, and from Him goes sweeping out to irrigate and fertilize every area of human life.

A true note i nthe Christmas spirit is merriment. It is more than joy; it is merriment. That is the increasing wonder of this strange religion of ours. Christianity is so solemn, and yet it has such a ring and fling of merriment to it. We do not say, "A solemn Christmas to you"—though the thought of the Incarnation brings us to our knees in the creed. We do not say "A happy Christmas to you," though we believe the secret of happiness is with Jesus; nor "A peaceful Christmas to you," though we carol "peace on earth, good will to men"; but a "Merry Christmas!" Not cheerful, but merry; for cheerfulness refers to an even and contented disposition; not "gay" Christmas, for gaiety is characteristically self-indulgent; not a "jovial" Christmas, for jovial has in it the paganism and sensuality of jove. but "merry," a word that is full of the wholesome laughter of a company. No one can be merry alone. It reuires a crowd. And "Merry Christmas" means that a whole community is fairly dancing like children at a party.

Was there even such cause for bells swinging, and feet dancing, and hearts leaping, and songs carolling, as the arrival of God among men? Take all the bells of all the towers in all the churches in Christendom and hang them in one belfry and set them all ringing at once on Christmas Day, bobs and bobs-royal and triple bobs-majors to the extent of their compass. and full ring of their metal, and their chimes have just one meaning. "His name shall be called "Wonderful," booms a bell, wonderful in truth, wonderful in life, wonderful in death, wonderful in resurrection, wonderful in the Church, wonderful in His disciples! And another bell turns over, "Counsellor!" and another, "The Mighty God!" and another, "The Everlasting Father!" and all of them, "The Prince of Peace!"

Another note is generosity. Every one gives gifts at Christmastide. At the touch of the Christ, selfishness is ashamed. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son." Love means giving. In New York State, in the Catskills, there is a lake. Many little streams flow into it, and one big stream flows out of it to water the thirsty city of New York. Every day of the year that little lake gives hundreds of thousands of gallons of water to the great city. It is give, give, give. Over in Palestine there is another lake. Plenty of streams flow into it, but none flows out. It takes everything and gives nothing. Do you know the name of it? The Dead Sea!

There is a story of a man coming home one Christmas Eve from work. He was thinking of his children and what a good time they would all have next day. All at once he saw a little boy in the street, ragged and hungry, and almost frozen. He stopped and asked where his home was, and the boy said he had no home. Then the man took him by the hand and led him to his home and gave him something to eat and tucked him in with the other children. When the house was quiet the father and mother began to prepare Christmas gifts. But nothing had been provided for the stranger. They were very poor and had been saving money for weeks to buy a goose for Christmas dinner. Well, they talked it over and decided to do without the goose, and to have just potatoes and porridge for dinner, so the little stranger might have a merry Christmas, too. So when the children woke next day there were warm clothing and shoes for all of them, including the boy they had found. And how happy he was! By and by they sat down for family devotions, and each child was asked to give a verse. When it came the turn of the stranger, he said, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me." Then he was gone. It was, so the story says, our blessed Lord himself.—Rev. G. C. Stewart, in The Witness.

A Hero in Everyday Life.

One writer has said, "The courage of the commonplace is greater than the courage of the crisis." Another, commenting on this thought, adds: "Perhaps, yet the two are one. The fitness for the great ordeal, if it be genuine, must spring for something in the character that did not generate in a moment." The following little story so aptly illustrates the second writer's conception of courage, the ability to meet the great test, whether it be short and sharp or long and soul-wearing, that it seems worth telling:

A few months ago there died in a remote Western ranching community a young man of about twenty-four, who, though unknown and unhonored save in the hearts of the little group that witnessed his unfaltering courage, was nevertheless, in the truest sense of the word, a hero.

He was a country lad, and, although he had lost his right arm when a youngster, he shared in most of the outdoor activities of his ranch home and made a favorable showing in the boyish feats that he and his chums engaged in. He never seemed to consider that the loss of his arm entitled him to immunity from farm work. He could drive a team and was a good rider. He had the coolest head and steadiest nerve in handling colts and unbroken horses. When the other boys hesitated about trying a "bad one," he would say, "You fellows give me a chance. I can ride this ol' outlaw." It was no idle boast, for he generally did.

He was of a social disposition; tall and good-looking. People generally liked him. Contentedly he followed his round of work and recreation. His was the normal outlook of a country boy reared amid simple surroundings and loving them for their wholesome sturdiness.

Suddenly came the knowledge that death, not life, was before him. Not a swift, merciful death that could be met at the flood of emotion and high valor as soldiers meet it in battle, but a slow, furtive death whose approach he must watch and wait for. More than five years before the end the doctors gave him up; for three he was a recluse. Afflicted with a lingering cancer, he was always in discomfort, often in acute pain.

When his mother would ask, "Well, how are you today?" he would reply cheerily, "Oh, just feelin' fine!" or "Not quite so stout, but still going strong, mother." He never complained.

At first he was able to attend the small social affairs of the neighborhood and to mingle with the young people as before, but as the disease advanced he had to forego even those simple pleasures. Gradually weakness compelled him to quit the little tasks that had helped to pass the time. Reading was his chief diversion, varied by a car ride or a visit with one of the few friends he continued to see. To one used to the changing outdoor duties of the ranch this enforced seclusion and inactivity were doubly irksome. But the grit that had made him stick to the bucking ponies and the patience and endurance learned during long, monotonous days of sheep herding did not now desert him. He met death with the same quiet courage with which he had awaited it.

Here was real heroism. There was no sudden burst of spectacular bravery, the result, perhaps, of the stimulus that some high-flaming moment gives, or of the desire to win the admiration and applause of his friends. This young man had in him the real stuff of heroes, the slow growth that follows daily battles obscurely, but valiantly waged, the winning of which gives also victory over self.

To the few who know of this modest young man's sturdy pluck and fine courage, he stands forth a shining inspiration. The pity of it is that he never could know that any one so regarded him. Such bravery merits a more substantial reward even on earth than a laurel wreath upon a grave.—Youth's Companion.

Habit Formation.

Mothers are often heard to say, "My children have such untidy habits, and I don't seem to be able to break them I talk all day long, but it doesn't do any good."

No mother needs to endure her children's untidy habits, or any other undesirable habits, if she goes about training in the right way, and is willing to take a little trouble to carry it out. Four simple rules based on psychology may serve to give such mothers an insight into the means of forming right habits. If carried out faithfully, these rules cannot fail to produce results.

First, decide for yourself what habit you wish to form. Then start enthusiastically and determinedly to break the old and launch the new one. Say to your children, "Beginning today, we are all going to hang up our wraps, and put our books and rubbers in the proper places when we come home from school. Let's see who remembers every time, and doesn't have to have mother tell her once about it." Arouse as much enthusiasm as you can about the matter. Be careful that you do not start to break and form anew too many habits at one time. Select one or two habits to work on, and keep at them until you are reasonably sure that they are well fixed. Then start on another.

Second, permit no exceptions to occur after you have once started. No matter how good the intentions of the children are, they will lapse into the old ways after a few days. That is when you will have to work. You will find that eternal vigilance on your part will be the price of your children's good habits. When Mary comes home in a hurry to go out to play, she will throw her books on the nearest chair. Don't say, "Oh, well, she is little, and it is hard to remember all the time. I'll let it go this time." That is where you will fail. Even though Mary has already gone away to play, she should be called back immediately and told in a kind manner, "You forgot your books today. Put them away, and then you may go to play." One or two experiences of that kind will soon make Mary more careful.

Third, repeat the desirable action as often as possible. We all know that the habit is most firmly fixed which we have been practicing longest. Seize every occasion to perform the act which you wish to become a habit, and its acquisition will come all the sooner.

Last of all, act; don't talk. As Professor James says, in his Talks to Teachers, "Don't preach too much or abound in good talk in the abstract." When Mary throws her coat on the floor and her rubbers in the middle of the hall, don't tell her that nice little girls don't do those things, or that she is a careless girl and should know better, and a great deal more to that effect. Simply call her as soon as you discover what she has done, and tell her quietly and good-naturedly to put her things away immediately, and then see that she does it. Such treatment as this is far more effective than mere talking.—Olive Roberts, University of Montana.

The Way to Bethlehem.

Long was the way to Bethlehem
To those who sought of old,
By burning sands and bitter springs
And nights of haunting cold,
Bearing their nard and frankincense,
Their precious gems and gold.

Hard was the way to Bethlehem,
So far it seemed, so far,
By flowerless vales and arid slopes
And barren heights that bar,
With ne'er an omen for a guide
Until they saw the star.

But then the way to Bethlehem,
It was no longer lone;
Joy was their comrade, those who trod
O'er bruising shard and stone,
Until they found for king a Child,
A manger for His throne.

Upon the way to Bethlehem,
Till Time shall bring release,
However dim and rough the path
May not our footsteps cease,
Since at the end for us awaits
The guerdon of His peace!

—Clinton Scolland, in N. Y. Sun.

Religion and the Home.

Home is the place of the highest joy; religion should sanctify it. Home is the sphere of the deepest sorrows; the highest consolation of religion should assuage its griefs. Home is the place of the greatest intimacy of heart with heart; religion should sweeten it with the joy of confidence. Home discovers all faults; religion should bless it with the abundance of charity. Home is the place for impressions, for instruction and culture; there should religion open her treasures of wisdom and pronounce her heavenly benediction.—E. J. Hardy.

In the Old Testament a visitation of God was always calamity. In the New Testament it was always to show His love and goodness. His coming to save is His only visitation. "God hath visited and redeemed His people."

For the Young Folks

Christ Was Born On Christmas Day.

Speed the message on its way,
Christ was born on Christmas Day,
Left His throne and came to earth,
Angels heralded His birth,
As they sang o'er Judah's hill—
"Peace on earth—to men good-will";
Swell the chorus of the sky—
"Glory be to God Most High";
Speed the message on its way,
Christ was born on Christmas Day.

He whom men and angels praise,
Lord of lords, Ancient of Days,
Came to rescue and to save
Man from darkness and the grave,
Came to set the captive free,
And awake earth's jubilee;
Hail Him King—our lives to bless,
Jesus Christ our righteousness—
Speed the message on its way,
Christ was born on Christmas Day.

Tell the story o'er and o'er,
Spread the news from shore to shore—
"For the weary there is rest,"
And in Christ mankind is blest;
"Tidings of great joy," 'tis true,
Love Incarnate, man may view—
"He is Saviour, Christ the Lord,"
Owned on earth, in heaven adored—
Speed the message on its way,
Christ was born on Christmas Day.

The Christmas Chimes.

We are told that long, long ago, and far, far away, in a certain city in the Old World, there was a very beautiful church. The church was so large that one at the doorway could hardly see the white marble altar and the choir of white-robed boys. The organ was so loud that when it was played the people not in the church were sometimes deceived, and thought there was a great thunder-storm, and closed their shutters and windows.

The church had a high belfry, a great stone tower, all ivy-covered. There were three silver bells in it. There was the great, great, big bell, the medium, middle-sized bell, and the weenie, wee little bit of a bell. The most wonderful thing about the bells was that they rang only once a year, on Christmas Eve, and no one knew who rang them. No ringer ever pulled the bell-rope, and yet the chimes rang out silvery clear on the frosty air.

"Clang! Clang! Clang!" That was the great, great big bell!

"Cling! Cling! Cling!" That was the medium, middle-sized bell!

"Ting-a-ling! Ting-a-ling! Ting-a-ling!" That was the weenie, wee little bit of a bell!

Who rang the bell? That was the mystery. Some said it was the wind that whistled—woo-o-o, through the belfry tower. Others looked wise and said, "Not so! It is the wee folk, the frost fairies of the upper air. They ride on the rims of the bells and sway them to and fro. But most believed it was the angels who rang the bells in memory of the dear Christ-Child's birth.

The people were very proud of their mysterious, wonderful bells, and every Christmas Eve they gathered in their church and waited till the hour for the chimes. Then they sang a hymn and went back to their homes.

One Christmas Eve the people gathered as usual in the church to hear the chimes ring out the silver story. The hour arrived, but wonder of wonders! no sound came from the bells. It was the first time the bells were ever known to be silent. Amazed, the people looked up in the belfry. There the bells hung—perfectly silent! What could be the matter! No one could tell. Then they said, "We'll wait a little longer; surely they will ring a little later." But no! not a note chimed out, though they sat in the church till the midnight hour. Then there was no use in waiting any longer, for it was now Christmas itself, and the bells chimed only on the eve of the holy day.

The people went sadly away. During the year that followed it was whispered that the reason the bells had not chimed was because some one in the city had done a bad deed, and because of this the angels would no longer ring the bells.

Years and years passed and rolled away, and still the bells hung silent. Generations rose and died and passed away, and the story of the bells became as a legend, sweet but untrue. It was so long since the chimes had been heard that the people only smiled when the story was told, and questioned whether they ever had rung. "It is only a story," they said; "the bells never did ring on Christmas Eve."

But at last there came to the city a very wise priest and a very holy one, and he heard the story of the bells, and said he was sure it was true. And he longed that they should ring again for the city. So he made a plan. He called all the people to the church on Christmas Eve and told them the story of the bells and how they had ceased to chime. "It comes to me," he said, "that if we make the right offering, the bells will chime again. So let us each, this year, plan a gift to lay on the altar next Christmas Eve. Surely some one of us will give a gift that will be seemly in the sight of the angels. Let us try it, anyway."

The people were pleased with the idea and all agreed. In the year that followed they were all busy planning their gifts for the altar.

Well, the year passed, and Christmas Eve arrived. There was hushed excitement all through the town, and the people were impatiently waiting for the evening, to go to the church to offer their gifts and perchance hear the bells renew their chimes.

A heavy snowstorm set in early in the morning. It snowed steadily all day—great, feathery flakes; but toward evening the wind scattered the clouds, and the stars stole out to spangle the dome of night, and the smiling moon gilded the world.

Now there lived in the town two little boys—brothers.

One of the boys was called Big Brother and the younger one was Little Brother. They had heard all about the offerings the people were planning to lay on the altar of the church. Big Brother wanted to give an offering, too, so he had been gathering all the small coins that came his way during the year. As Big Brother belonged to poor folks, and lived in a humble cottage, he had but few coins at the close of the year; but they seemed a great many to him, and he was very proud and happy when he changed them all for one large silver piece to lay on the altar.

On the evening of the great day, near the appointed time, the people all turned out to go to the church with their gifts. There were many great folks going. The king himself was to be there and many others of great renown.

Big Brother and Little Brother set out together for the church. They took a narrow street off the main road. Big Brother held the precious coin. The little street was deserted; there wasn't a person on it but themselves. The wind had drifted the deep snow into strange, ghostly-looking shapes. It was very lonely in the street. Little Brother held close to Big Brother's hand. "Big Brother," he whispered. "I'm afraid."

Big Brother laughed. "Afraid! What of? There is nothing to fear. God is with us always."

Just as they reached the middle of the street they heard a sound—ow-w-w— like one in pain. They paused and looked around. There was no one to be seen. But listen; there was the sound again—ow-w-w.

Little Brother held Big Brother's hand tightly. Big Brother listened. "It's across the street," he said. "Something is hurt. I must see what it is. You wait here. I'll go over. The snow is too deep for you." So Little Brother waited, and Big Brother waded through the snow to the other side. He still heard the sound, but could see nothing. Then he put his hand down on the ground where the sound came from and there was a little white dog—a lame puppy, starving and freezing! Big Brother lifted it tenderly, opened his coat, and buttoned the creature up next his warm breast. "There," he said, gently, "you'll soon be nice and warm, you poor little thing!"

Then he crossed over to Little Brother and told him what he had found. "Now," he said, "if the doggie doesn't get food and warmth, he'll die, so I must take him home. I can't go to the church, but my coin must go on the altar. You take it, and when the priest asks for the gifts, you put mine on the altar. I want to make the bells ring."

Little Brother hesitated. "I'm afraid, Big Brother," he said.

"There's nothing to fear," replied Big Brother. "Just say to yourself, 'God is with us,' and the angels will take care of you." So Little Brother finally agreed, and taking the coin, off he trotted.

Big Brother went home and fixed a warm blanket for the dog before the hearth where the logs burned brightly, gave him warm milk, and the contented dog curled on the blanket and slept. And Big Brother waited.

Meanwhile, Little Brother went into the great church. How big it seemed, and how wonderful with the thousands of wax candles lighting it! And such a company of people! Near the altar stood the white-robed priest. In the choir the singers, and there in his pew sat the king, with his crown upon his head. The church was crowded, and Little Brother felt very small and unimportant, indeed, as he stole into a corner near the door and waited.

After a time the priest spoke: "Let us wait and not make our offerings till the hour when, the legend tells us, the bells chimed in the long ago." So they all waited, but when the hour arrived the bells were silent. Then said the priest, "Bring your offerings to the altar."

First arose the king, and the people were breathless. What would the king give? Straight to the altar he went, and taking his crown from his head, he laid it down, saying humbly, "I give my crown itself, to prove that I be but the servant of Him Who reigns." And the people said, "Oh, surely for the king's gift the bells will chime." But no, not a sound! The king was sad thereat and said softly, "Alas! I be not worthy enough."

Then came a man of great wealth and he had a sack of gold for the altar. "I give my gold," he said, "for I have nothing more dear to me." Thought the people, "Surely for gold the bells will ring." But though we may do much with gold in the world, we cannot bribe the angels with it. And the bells chimed not.

Then came a great poet and he laid a scroll on the altar. "I give my poem," he said; "it is the best thought of my mind." "Surely," whispered the people, "for a great thought the bells will ring." But no, the bells were silent.

Then an artist placed beside the poet's scroll a picture. "I give this," he said; "I dipped my brush in my soul for the colors. It is my soul itself." And the people were sure the bells would ring for the artist's soul. But no chimes broke the air.

One by one the other people laid their offerings on the altar, but the bells rang not. And in his corner Little Brother felt smaller and smaller, seeing the great company and the wonderful gifts, and Big Brother's coin that had seemed so large to him, now seemed so small, clutched in his tiny hand. Oh, he couldn't go up before all these people. The angels would laugh at such a gift, and anyway, he was afraid of the priest and the king and the mighty company of people. As he cowered in his corner something spoke in his ear. It sounded like Big Brother's voice! "There is nothing to fear. God is with us always. And you promised Big Brother to put his coin on the altar."

That was true. He had promised, so he gathered his baby courage and toddled up the aisle to the altar. All the people smiled to see a baby going up with an offering—all but the priest—his eyes were dim. And the baby went straight to the altar, where he placed the coin right beside the crown of the king.

"Clang! Clang! Clang!"

"Cling! Cling! Cling!"

"Ting-a-ling! Ting-a-ling! Ting-a-ling!"

The bells were a-chime, silvery clear on the frosty air.

The people were breathless! What had the child placed on the altar? The bells ceased directly and the priest said to Little Brother, "What did you place on the altar?"

Little Brother was frightened and burst into tears. "I didn't mean any harm," he sobbed. "I only put Big Brother's coin on the altar." Then he stammered out the story of the starving dog.

The king stood near listening. His eyes were moist as he laid his hand on the child's head. "I know why the bells rang," he said. "Not for the crown of the king, not for the gleam of the gold, not for the artist's vision, not for the poet's song, for in all of these there dwells, after all, a certain vain pride. They rang for the self forgotten love of a little child's pure heart. Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

"Clang! Clang! Clang!"

"Cling! Cling! Cling!"

"Ting-a-ling! Ting-a-ling! Ting-a-ling!"

As if to prove the truth of the king's words, the bells were a-chime again!

When Little Brother went home that night he rushed into the room where Big Brother sat before the fire with the slumbering dog. "Oh, Big Brother," he cried, "the bells rang when I put your coin on the altar! You ought to have heard them!"

"I did," replied Big Brother, dreamily, "and I thought I saw the angels pulling the bell rope."

"Clang! Clang! Clang!"

"Cling! Cling! Cling!"

"Ting-a-ling! Ting-a-ling? Ting-a-ling!"

The bells chimed all night long.—Selected.

A Living Gift.

By Page Price (Age 13 Years.)

Margaret Hampton and her father were sailing along over the moonlit waves. They were on board the Chesapeake, sailing for China. Margaret was a small girl of ten and her father had been a missionary in China for many years. Her mother had died when she was three years old, and Margaret had been raised entirely by her father. They had come to America because Margaret had been threatened with fever, and now they were on their way back to China. It was rather a sad home-coming for Margaret, because she did not know whether the little cabin, which had been her home all of her life, would be there. After a long journey they landed, and traveled fifty miles on an old dingy train. They arrived at their home at midnight.

Margaret and her father had been home now for five months, and it was Christmas night. They had just finished supper, and were sitting by the fire. Mr. Hampton was reading the story of the first Christmas to her, when a stamping of feet was heard at the door and a Chinaman ran in and exclaimed in an excited voice:

"Come, quick! There is a man dying in the house across the hill, and he wants to see you."

Mr. Hampton grabbed up his hat and coat, and, stooping, kissed his little girl and said:

"Don't worry, dear; I will come back as soon as possible. Shep will take good care of you while I am gone."

Shep wagged his tail and looked up at his master as if to say, "I will protect her."

* * * * * * *

Margaret's father had been gone nearly three hours, and it was growing very late. She had been thinking of America and of what a strange place it was, when there came a scratching at the door. Shep looked up and growled. Margaret was very frightened; she did not know whether to go to the door or not. The scratching continued, and she got up, very much afraid, and finally opened the door. When she did so a cold blast of wind blew in. She looked out into the darkness and saw a large Shepherd dog standing on the porch. He greeted her with a bark and ran off and then came back. He did this several times, and then Margaret knew what he wanted. She went back into the house and got her coat and stepped out into the cold night again with her dog beside her. She followed the strange dog until he came to a small woods, and right on the edge the dog stopped. When she came up she saw a small form lying on the ground, and as she looked closer she saw that it was a little boy. She stooped down and picked him up and started towards home with him, with both dogs behind her. She soon grew tired, for the little boy was very heavy, and had to stop to rest. She picked him up again and staggered on against the cold wind. After a hard journey she reached her home. She carried the little boy in and put him on the bed. Then she got a bowl of milk, heated it and gave it to him. She noticed then that he was not like the people she was used to seeing every day. He was soon fast asleep.

Mr. Hampton came back at daybreak and found his little girl wide awake and waiting for him. She met him at the door and made him come in softly. She said:

"I have something for you; here it is on the bed."

He went over to the bed and looked at the boy and said:

"Why, he is an American; he is one of the party of sight-seers that passed here three days ago. I don't think he has had anything to eat since then. His mother and father are at the mission now looking for him. We will go over there in the morning and take him to them for a Christmas present."

Then he took Margaret in his lap, kissed her, and said:

"You are a brave little girl."

Margaret put her head on his shoulder and murmured in a low voice:

"This is the happiest Christmas I have ever spent, for I have saved a life tonight."

Bishop Wells Celebrates Eightieth Birthday.

The Rt. Rev. L. H. Wells, D. D., retired Bishop of Spokane, but still active in the ministry as rector of St. Mark's Church, Tacoma, celebrated his eightieth birthday Saturday evening, December 3, at St. Mark's Parish House.

It was one of the most unique gatherings of the city for years past, both in spontaneity as well as in the character of those present. The assembly-room of the parish house was scarcely able to hold those who came to do him honor.

Subsequent to his retirement as Bishop of the Missionary District of Spokane six years ago, Bishop Wells came to Tacoma and started the work of St. Mark's Parish, in the extreme north end of the city, and in this time has built a church building and the largest parish house in the city. This property, representing an investment of $15,000, is completely paid for, and plans are being matured for the erection of a rectory.

Communicants of our Church, as well as others, crowded into the parish house on this occasion to add their expression of appreciation of the Bishop's life and work. The Bishop is the most respected citizen of Tacoma, and most highly revered as well by the clergy of the Diocese of Olympia.

Addresses on the occasion were made by the Rev. H. I. Oberholtzer, one of the Bishop's former clergy in Spokane, and also by Dr. F. T. Webb, retired presbyter of the Diocese of Olympia, representing the clergy of the Diocese, who also presented a set of splendidly worded resolutions on behalf of a committee from the clergy; Mr. A. H. Denman spoke on behalf of the laymen, and this part of the evening's entertainment was concluded by a very interesting reminiscence by Bishop Wells himself, of his early missionary work in Washington.

Despite his years, Bishop Wells is remarkably well preserved, and is one of the most active missionaries in the Diocese. The Northwest has had no more zealous or aggressive missionary than Bishop Wells.

Memorial Trees Planted.

A special service was held at St. Cyprian's Church, Lufkin, the Rev. H. M. Kellam, rector), on Armistice Day, for the soldiers from Angelina County who gave their lives for the cause of truth and righteousness during the World War. After the service in the Church the rector and people marched in procession to the church yard, where seven trees were planted and blessed in their memory. Each tree was given by a member of the congregation who had been a leading worker in all war activities. This was the only congregation in Lufkin holding a public memorial service for the departed soldiers and to pray for God's blessing on the Conference for the Limitation of Armaments.

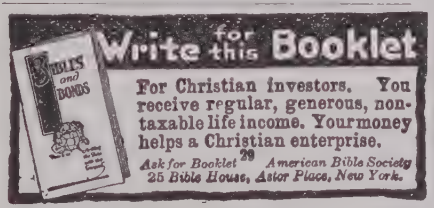
LEXINGTON

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

Trinity Church, Covington, the Rev. James D. Gibson, rector, has just had the pleasure of sending a most beautiful sox of pictures and books to one of our missionaries in the Dominican Republic. These books are to be used as gifts to individuals or as a nucleus for a circulating library. The pictures are to be distributed by the missionary among the homes of his people so that no home should be left without at least one picture of some incident in the life or teaching of our Lord.

A Christmas Carol.



The earth has grown old with its burden of care,
But at Christmas it always is young,
The heart of the jewel burns lustrous and fair,
And its soul, full of music, breaks forth on the air,
When the song of the angels is sung.

It is coming, Old Earth, it is coming to-night,
On the snowflakes that cover thy sod,
The feet of the Christ-Child fall gentle and white
And the voice of the Christ-Child tells out with delight,
That mankind are the children of God.

On the sad and the lonely, the wretched and poor,
The voice of the Christ-Child shall fall,
And to every blind wandered opens the door
Of a hope that he dared not dream of before,
With a sunshine of welcome for all.

The feet of the humblest may walk in the field
Where the feet of the holiest have trod;
This, this is the marvel to mortals revealed,
When the silvery trumpets of Christmas have pealed
That mankind are the children of God.

COLONEL N. B. TUCKER.

Minute in referenec to the death of COLONEL N. B. TUCKER, adopted December 12, 1921, by the vestry of R. E. Lee Memorial Church, Lexington, Va.

Colonel N. B. Tucker was born September 22, 1867.

He died in the midst of a career of distinguished usefulness, in the early morning of the 11th instant.

He was a son of Thomas S. B. and Julia Clarke Tucker. His father was a son of Judge Beverly Tucker, an eminent judge and author in the first half of the last century, of the distinguished family of that name and blood, of Virginia and of Bermuda.

Graduating at the Virginia Military Institute in June, 1888, first in his class, after serving as an assistant professor for several years, he was made a full professor in the institute, filling most acceptably and with great ability the chair of Mineralogy and Geology.

He early became a member of this church, and more than twenty-two years ago was chosen a member of this vestry.

On the 6th of January, 1904, he was elected Junior Warden, and on the 5th of September, 1905, he was made Senior Warden, a position the duties of which he continued to discharge with efficiency and fidelity down to the day of his death.

He was deeply interested in the work of the church, and promoted the success of its activities by liberal contributions and by valuable service.

His lovely and lovable traits of character, his thoughtful consideration of others, uniform cheerfulness and friendliness, his unfailing courtesy and kindness, his attractiveness of countenance so often lit up with a bright and kindly smile, all went to make up a most charming personality and to endear our lamented colleague and friend to all who were brought in contact with him, and particularly to the members of this vestry.

His untimely death has come upon us without any warning, with the terrible shock of an unexpected blow, but it none the less, because of its suddenness, is to us a bereavement, and to the community an irreparable loss.

While the loss to the great school which he has served with such ability, to the community in whose welfare he manifested a patriotic interest, and to the church to whose cause he devoted himself so earnestly, is beyond any measure of human appraisement, we realize that that loss is far different and less poignant than the bereavement of her who has been the sharer of his joys and his sorrows, and the companion of his journey through life, and far less grievous than the affliction of the dear son whose most precious possession will be the heritage of his father's name and character and benediction.

Our deepest sympathy goes out to them with the trust that a merciful Providence will guard and protect them always.

The Register will please cause this minute to be spread upon the record book of this vestry, and send a copy of it to the widow of our lamented friend, and a copy to each of the newspapers published in the town of Lexington, to the Southern Churchman, and to the Southwestern Episcopalian, for publication in their columns.

PREAMBLE AND RESOLUTIONS PASSED BY THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES ON THE DEATH OF DR. PRUDEN.

On Friday, December 9, at 5:45 o'clock P. M., in Richmond, occurred the death of REV. C. ORLANDO PRUDEN, D. D., the founder, nearly thirty years ago, of this institute. The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls originated in what was then the Danville Convocation, which by resolution undertook the establishment of the shcool. From its very inception Rev. Dr. Pruden was put at its head.

By labors and sacrifice, such as is seldom seen, he, with his coadjutor, Rev. Chiswell Dabney, has raised the school from a few girls in what had been a private home on the present site to the magnificent institution which now crowns this hill, overlooking the beautiful village of Chatham, Va.

Dr. Pruden, with faith unparalleled, remained true to the ideal of his dream, which was to furnish to the young women of the South, whose parents had but moderate means, a thorough education. This has been accomplished for hundreds of young women, who have returned to their homes from this institute to be centers of Church life and influence, and factors in civic betterment and improvement wherever they went.

The Board of Trustees, which has with unfailing sympathy and pride endorsed and strengthened his plans through all these years, cannot find words sufficient to express all that Dr. Pruden's going from their midst means to the organization as a board, and to every member thereof personally.

Nevertheless, at its meeting at the institute, on December 12, the board appointed the undersigned, with instructions to draft resolutions to express, even though inadequately, their sense of loss.

The committee presented the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, that the Board of Trustees of "The Chatham Episcopal Institute" has been shocked at the knowledge of the sudden loss it has sustained in the death of Dr. Pruden, its beloved and trusted co-worker for so many years in the establishment of this school.

That in the judgment of the board the school has only been made possible by his unceasing interest and self-sacrifice.

That the institute is, and forever will be, a lasting memorial to his name and fame, as a Christian educator of Southern womanhood.

That this preamble and these resolutions but feebly express the sentiment of the entire board, upon this, their first meeting without the inspiration of Dr. Pruden's presence.

That the board extends to his family its heartfelt sympathy in their sorrow, and shares with them a sense of our common bereavement.

That this preamble and these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this meeting ,a copy engrossed and sent to Mrs. Pruden, and a copy furnished to the Southern Churchman and the Diocesan Record.

J. CLEVELAND HALL,
G. WALLACE RIBBLE,
R. LOGAN COLEMAN,
Committee.

SAMUEL DAVIS PAGE.

Mr. Page married Miss Isabel Graham Wurts, daughter of William Wurts, of Philadelphia, and is survived by the following children: Howards Wurts Page, Ethel Nelson Page, now Mrs. James Large, and William Byrd Page.

Mr. Page graduated from Yale College in 1859, and afterwards studied law in the Harvard Law School, and entered upon the practice of his profession in 1864, and became a distinguished and successful lawyer. He was a devout communicant of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, and served upon the vestry of that church for thirty-six years.

He did faithful service in the Church, in the city, in the State and in certain Federal offices. It is recorded of him that he, "Mr. Page was to be found in his place in St. Peter's Church on Sundays and nearly every holy day, rain or shine." "He was a regular and devout communicant."

In his love for his Saviour, and in his efforts to advance His cause, he set an example most worthy to be followed.

RESOLUTIONS.

At a meeting of the vestry of John's Parish, on December 11, 1921, the following minute was passed:

Whereas, WILLIAM COCHRAN EUSTIS, for many years a vestryman of this parish, has rendered his final earthly accounting, and on November 24, 1921, passed into life eternal.

Resolved, that the vestry of John's Parish hereby notes this fact upon its minutes, and in addition places on record its gratitude to Almighty God for the good example of His faithful servant and our loyal fellow-worker in this parish.

Resolved, that a copy of this minute be sent to the family of Mr. Eustis, with an added expression of the vestry's sympathy for Mrs. Eustis and her children in their sense of personal loss and bereavement; and that a copy be sent to the Southern Churchman for publication.

DAVID CAMPBELL MAYERS, Rector.

JOHN MOORE,
Secretary.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, that the members of St. John's, Tallahassee, Fla., Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary have heard with sorrow and deep regret of the death of their friend and co-worker, MRS. ROBERT HOWARD GAMBLE, which occurred in Baltimore, Md., November 7. In her long life, full of activities, she has touched many lives for good, she has left all who love her a good example and a precious memory full of inspiration. Of a nature of exceptional generosity she gave freely of herself and means. No call from the poor or needy, or those in distress, ever fell unheeded on her ear. She devoted much time to work among prisoners, she was a devoted member of the Episcopal Church, an active member in all of its organizations. Few among us were so beloved. Her passing away leaves a vacancy none other can fill. Cheery, courteous and gracious, a real, gentle woman of the Old South. Truly it can be said of her, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, for their works do follow them."

Happy, thrice happy, they who hear,
Thy sacred trumpet's joyful sound,
Who may at festivals appear,
With Thy most glorious presence crown.

MRS. ANNA CLAYTON LOGAN.

ANNA CLAYTON LOGAN, daughter of the late James W. and Sarah Ann (Strother) Logan, and wife of the late Colonel R. H. Logan, of Salem, Va., entered into rest at Pensacola, Fla., on September 16, 1921, and was buried in Salem, Va., in the cemetery overlooking the beautiful Roanoke Valley.

She was born at "Dungeness," Goochland County, Va., where she spent her childhood days and the years of her young womanhood. After the Civil War she left the place of her nativity and made her home with her parents and the other members of the family in Salem, Va. There she established a school and nobly met a situation which was enough to crush the usual character, but she was unusual. In her new home she was soon recognized as possessed of remarkable culture, of splendid courage, and of a most gracious personality, and was loved, admired and honored by all. Many are indebted to her for kindness and helpfulness, and especially at a time when all were sorely tried. The sun sets beyond the western hills, but the ray of light left behind guides the traveler to his distant home. The oak falls in the forest and in time is turned into coal, but our fires burn the brighter because it grew and fell. Influence is eternal and travels on throughout all eternity.

She is survived by three children, Mrs. Paul Nugent, of Tucson, Ariz.; Mrs. Joseph C. Logan, of Atlanta, Ga.; and Mrs. Mallory Kennedy, of Pensacola, Fla., and by one sister, Mrs. Samuel White, of Salem, Va., and three brothers, George W. Logan, Salem, Va.; Joseph D. Logan, Salem, Va., and the Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., warden of the DuBose Memorial Church Training School, Monteagle, Tenn.

Now the laborer's task is o'er;
Now the battle day is past;
Now upon the farther shore
Lands the voyager at last.
Father, in Thy gracious keeping,
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Arthur L. Kenyon, for four years rector of Emmanuel Church, Chatham, Va., has accepted a call to St. Paul's Church, Suffolk, Va., succeeding the Rev. John F. Coleman, who goes to Clarke County, Va., on January 15. Mr. Kenyon expects to take up his new work in February.

The Rev. Harry M. Kellam has resigned the rectorship of St. Cyprian's Church, Lufkin, Tex., and has accepted the call to become assistant minister at Trinity Church, Galveston. He will move to Galveston the latter part of December. All communications for the Registrar of the Diocese of Texas should be addressed to him there.

The Rev. Frank E. Cooley, who recently resigned the rectorship of Holy Trinity, Madisonville, Cincinnati, O., is temporarily in charge of St. John's Church, Covington, Ky.

On December 5, in Old Christ Church, Philadelphia, the Rev. Paul Micou and Miss Janet Sayce Childs were married by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Louis C. Washburn, and the Rev. Dr. William E. Gardner. Mr. Micou is one of the secretaries of the Department of Religious Education of the Presiding Bishop and Council, and has charge of our Church's work for college and university students. Mrs. Micou is the daughter of Mr. Allen Childs, who was well known in Philadelphia Church circles for his untiring devotion to his duties on certain diocesan boards and committees and on the vestry of Christ Church.

The Rev. J. Lewis Gibbs, rector of Emanuel Church, Staunton, Va., has been appointed captain and chaplain in the Virginia National Guard and assigned to the staff of Colonel Heriome L. Opie, commanding the Second Infantry.

The Rev. J. E. W. Cook, who for some months has been minister in charge of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Wilmington, N. C., has recently been placed in charge of the missionary work in the Wilmington Archdeaconry, made vacant by the resignation of Archdeacon Miller, who becomes rector of St. Paul's Church, Wilmington.

The Rev. R. T. McCutchen, formerly a missionary at Zamboauga, in the Philippines, but recently at Del Rio, Tex., has been called to the rectorship of Trinity Church, Victoria, Tex., and began work there the first Sunday in Advent.

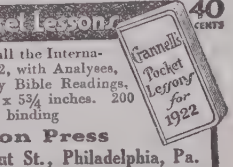
The Rev. Edward F. Hayward, at present rector of St. Andrew's Church, Houston, Tex., has accepted the call given him by the vestry of Grace Church, Monroe, La., to become its rector. Mr. Hayward expects to take charge of the parish at a very early date. He has had a notably successful pastorate at St. Andrew's Church, Houston, and the congregation at Monroe are to be congratulated upon securing him as their rector.

The Rev. George Ossman has resigned his work at Wharton and Eagle Lake, Tex., and accepted a call to St. Andrew's Church, Houston. He begins work there the second Sunday in January.

The Rev. Alexander Miller, who for some months has served very acceptably as Archdeacon, of Wilmington, Diocese of East Carolina, has accepted a call to become rector of St. Paul's Church, Wilmington.

The Rev. A. W. Skardon, many years rector of Grace Church, St. Francisville, La., announced his resignation on December 12, and will assume the pastorate of Christ Church, Bastrop, La., at the beginning of the new year.

Ordinations.



On St. Andrew's Day, in St. Peter's Church, at Rockport, Tex., Mr. E. Davis Williams was ordered deacon by the Rt. Rev. William T. Capers, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese. The candidate was presented by the Archdeacon, the Ven. B. S. McKenzie; the sermon was preached by the Rev. Francis A. Brown, and the Rev. G. W. Smith, rector of Grace Church, Cuero, Tex., acted as the Bishop's chaplain. The Rev. Mr. Williams came to the Diocese as one of the war secretaries for the Brotherhood of St. Andrew to Camp Travis. In this capacity he served with such faithfulness and devotion that the Bishop and Archdeacon urged him to return to the Diocese and take up work as a layman until he could take orders. He took up the work at Aransas Pass, Beeville, Karnes City, Kenedy, Runge and Rockport more than a year ago. He has served these places with such acceptability that it is the earnest hope of the people of these missions that he should remain with them permanently. Mr. Williams has belonged to the Brotherhood from its beginning; served as war secretary in Camp Fremont at Palo Alto, Cal., also at Camp Travis, San Antonio, Tex., and was selected as one of twenty men to take up some special work for the War Commission of the Church. Has served thirty years or more as lay reader in the Dioceses of Pittsburgh, Chicago, Utah and Los Angeles.

In St. Simon's Church, San Fernando, Cal., on Sunday, November 13, Mr. Anthony H. Dexter was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Stevens. He was presented by the general missionary of the Diocese, the Rev. Robert Renison, under whose direction he has been working. The sermon was preached by the Rev. William A. Gustin. Morning Prayer was read by Chaplain Hubbard and the Rev. Robert Renison, and the Litany by the Rev. Alfred Fletcher. The Rev. Mr. Dexter is a graduate of Brown University, and has been lay reader in charge at San Fernando.

Vol. 86. RICHMOND, VA., DECEMBER 31, 1921. No. 53.

Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light,
The year is dying in the night,
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.
Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring happy bells, across the snow,
This year is going, let him go.
Ring out the false, ring in the true.
Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more,
Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
Ring in redress to all mankind.
Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold,
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace.
Ring in the valient man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand,
Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be.

Our Lord's Return.

If our Lord's return means anything, it means the introduction of a life which has no end; it means, for all who will, succession to the inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away.

The coming of our Lord means that all the wrong-doing and the passions of man which create so much misery will have had their day; it means an entrance, actual or possible, upon a stage of existence in which there will be no sorrow nor crying; it means the exercise of man's higher powers to the fullest extent of their capacity—the beginning of an existence in which thought and heart and will rest in perfectly ecstatic satisfaction on their one true objeect, and an existence which will last forever.—Canon Liddon.

Making it Homelike.

On Dolly's birthday she was presented with a baby bulldog, and her delight was delicious to behold.

It was very young, and she insisted upon taking it to bed with her, but the next morning she was looking very tired.

"Haven't you slept well, darling?" asked her mother.

"No, mummy," said Dolly. "Nelson was crying in the night for his mumsey, so I kept awake with him for company, and I made awful faces all night to make him fink I was his bulldog muvver to comfy him!"—London Answers.

Far off, so far, the heavens be,
With their wide arms! and I would prove
The close, warm-beating heart of Love.
But so far-off the heavens be:
Dear Jesus, let me lean on Thee!

A Praying Church.

A prosperous church is a church which prays. It is written, "My house shall be called a house of prayer." We must never lose faith in prayer. We must never abandon prayer. We must never lose the spirit of prayer. A church can get on for a considerable time without singing, and can go on indefinitely with indifferent singing. A church may do well with poor preaching, and even without preaching of any kind. But a church without prayer is no church at all. We might as well expect a man to live without breathing as to expect a church to live without praying. Pray for the minister. Pray for the sick and afflicted. Pray for the children. Pray for the lost. Pray for the community. Pray for one another. Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that He may send forth laborers into His harvest. Pray without ceasing. Pray everywhere. Let the church be characterized by prayer, filled with the atmosphere of prayer, and crowded with the trophies of prayer.

God's Glory.

"I should like to see your God," said the Emperor Trajan to a Jewish rabbi. "No mortal eye can look upon Him," the rabbi replied. When the emperor insisted, the rabbi said, "Well, suppose we begin by looking at one of His ambassadors," and bade the emperor gaze at the mid-day sun in a cloudless sky. "I cannot," the emperor confessed; "the light dazzles me." "If, then," said the rabbi, "you cannot endure the glory of one of His creatures, how could you behold the unclouded glory of the Creator?"—Selected.

The highest reaches we can attain here are but broken fragments of the full divine beauty. At the best we can only become dimly transfigured; only faintly does the beauty of the Lord appear in us. The last design made by the great painter, Albert Durer, was a drawing showing Christ on His cross. It was all completed, except the face of the Divine Sufferer. When the artist was summoned away by death at the end of the longest and holiest life we shall have but a part of the picture of Christ wrought upon our soul. Our best striving shall leave but a fragment of the matchless beauty. The glory of that blessed Face we cannot reproduce. But when we go away from our life's fragment of transfiguuration we shall look a moment afterward upon the divine features, and, seeing Jesus as He is, shall be like Him.—J. R. Miller.

Love is an invisible force, but its trancings are found wherever humanity has lived.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF ST. ANDREW IN THE UNITED STATES

An organization in the Church for the spread of Christ's Kingdom among men and boys by means of Personal Prayer and Personal Service.

Convinced that Chapters of the Brotherhood can only attain their maximum effectiveness by having a carefully laid out program covering at least a one-year period, the Brotherhood is suggesting the following minimum program as the basis of the Chapter's corporate work for 1922.

A Monthly Men's Corporate Communion.
Ushering and Hospitality at Church Door.
A Church Attendance Campaign during the year.
House-to-House Canvass to uncover additional opportunities for personal work.
Hotel-Boarding House Work.
Round Table Conferences or Periodic Bible Class.
Organize Junior Chapter if there be none in the Parish.
Arrange two visits to other Chapters or Churches to increase interest in the Brotherhood.
A Delegate to the National Convention.
Co-operate with the Nation-Wide Campaign.

Two or more men or boys, with the consent of the Rector, can organize a Chapter.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"I preached philosophy and won applause," says one; "I preached Christ and won souls."—Record of Christian Work.

Since a young man fell asleep with disastrous results under the preaching of St. Paul, the problem of attracting and holding young people has been with us.—George Spillito.

As the old year wanes, may sin, sorrow, misunderstandings, jealousies, envyings, selfishness, fear, and all that robs us of vision and the use of dormant possibilities wane. As the New Year dawns, may the dawning of a deeper love, larger faith and wider vision for home, country, world and Church be our portion, and enlighten us with joyful service for God and humanity.

There is one true joy in life—being used in a great purpose realized by yourself to be a divine one. Therein alone can one discover the meaning of his life—by finding his use to God.

The one of whom we think is the one who controls our motives and purposes. If our minds are stayed upon God, if we trust Him, we shall ever be kept in perfect peace, and have the power of control as well as the control of power.—John Timothy Stone.

We celebrate His holy birth,
And feel a beauty through the hour—
Not born of earth—a gladness winged
With something more than mortal power,
Oh, may we know it is His love
Which moves across the earth to bless;
To make life glow where'er men show
His larger law of kindliness.
—Mary Cromwell Low.

When diverging crews shall learn
Towards their central source to turn,
When contending churches tire
Of the earthquake, wind and fire;
Here let strife and clamor cease
At that still small voice of peace—
"May they all united be In the Father and in Me."
—Dean Stanley.

No man may live unto himself, and yet,
How poor are they who scorn their Olivet!
Who, in their turmoil, seek not day or night
The sanctuary of the mountain height,
Fulfilled with whose indomitable breath
Long time ago the Lord of Nazareth
Raised up the fallen and subdued the strong,
And woke the stars to universal song.
—G. Thomas.

We, the older folks, have told our tale. What we are, we probably shall be. But a child makes the world new. No one can reckon its possibilities, its worth. Humanity clusters about the cradle and the school; its dearest concerns are the babies. They are the harbingers of hope; that mold and make a better civilization; they remove the miseries of living; they are a moral force without an equal.—Rev. C. A. Ashby.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., DECEMBER 31, 1921. No. 53.

WHAT SHALL THE NEW YEAR BRING?

With deliberate meaning we put the question in that form. It would be possible to write it another way. We could write it merely, What WILL the New Year bring? Between those two forms of question lies the difference between two attitudes of mind which are as wide apart as success and failure.

For the trouble with many of us is that we face our future with a poor, passive fatalism. We act as though all that we could do were to sit down and let the veiled shapes of unpredictable days bring us what fortunes they would, whether good or ill. What will the future be? we say. We ask the question with no hint that the things which may be can be shaped by our determination. It is a mere interrogation, as of a fate which moves on mechanically to ends already foreordained.

But far otherwise ought to be the question which we ask. What SHALL the New Year bring? let us say. Thereby we ask the question not as pawns of destiny, but as its masters. Therein we make our question not a mere guess, but an imperative. We indicate that the future, in its deepest reality, can be and shall be that which we determine.

Do we not need this spirit in our personal lives as we confront the infinite wonder of the calendar's new span of life? Why should we drift, with dull acceptance of results to be shaped in us by events that we do not seek to over-master and control? Many of us are conformed to this world because so slavishly we let the world put its unresisted pressure upon us. The outward accidents make us what they chance because we have not conceived beforehand the pattern by which in its creative power of the sons of God we resolve to make ourselves.

But it is possible, as we set our faces toward the future from the hilltop of the New Year's moment of vision, to meet the coming days as conquerors. We can wrestle with them, as Jacob wrestled with the angel at Peniel, and never let them go until they bless us. We can be so transformed by the renewing of our minds that we can make all the facts of life play their part in a transforming plan.

So, also, is it with those mightier matters of destiny which concern not only individual men and women, but the lives of nations. The thing that made the glory of the spirit of America during the war was the fact that it was lifted to a flaming courage in which it believed and dared all things. It believed not only in the immediate objective of victory in arms, but it believed in the loftier and far-beckoning things. It believed that the old world, so cursed with hate and blood and shame, could be made again according to a higher and a holier pattern. It believed in a war to end war. It believed in a brotherhood of peoples which shone like a star above the clouds of evil. By contrast, the saddest thing in the months which followed the war was the cheap and flippant cynicism which made men shrug their shoulders at the thought of creative ideals. Nations drifted with the tide of events, rather than sought to direct them into nobler channels. We assumed—even we in this new world—a palsied attitude of disillusionment, and for a time surrendered our great commission to take the world, so broken by its convulsions, and recreate it in a larger faith. But the fine fact in these most recent days has been that the truer genius of America is re-asserting its mastery. The Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, in Washington, though its achievements are as yet but fragmentary, nevertheless is inspiring in this: that it has revealed a will to take hold deliberately of certain of our world-problems, to analyze them with intelligence, and to deal with them in a spirit determined to achieve results. The conference will doubtless bring to pass a limitation of navies; it may largely put an end—at least in this next decade—to the causes of strife in the Pacific. How much further the plan of world-association will go depends altogether upon the will of the people. There are many still who make a boast of fatalism, who talk as though wars always will inevitably occur, and reject superciliously the hope that the best elements in our world can attain sufficient control to prevent them. Against unfaith we must measure a stronger faith. Against the mind which assumes that the future will be thus and thus because of blind, intractable forces that rule it regardless of our desires, we must set up the spirit which declares that the future shall be what, by God's grace, we will to make it. Herein lies the difference be-

1922

Give you greeting for New Year,
Lord and lady, saint and seer.
Hail and healing, sons of hell!
Climb the pit wherein you fell.

Come, you people, forth and stand
Eyes to east, among the band
Clothed and ready for the road
Where the urge of lash or goad

Threatens not the ransomed slave;
'Tis the road that only brave,
True and loyal men have trod
In the ecstasy of God.

Lay the ancient burden down—
Bale of merchandise or crown,
Creed and caste or foolish sin—
Now the march of Man begin!

—Robert Norwood.

tween the darkness and the dawn. The worth of any international policy and the outcome of every plan of statesmen and of diplomats will be determined according to the strength of the people's conviction as to what can be achieved. For ourselves, for America, for the world, this New Year can bring whatever we masterfully resolve.

These achievements are valuable in themselves, and they may become infinitely more valuable if they are made part of a larger plan. They can have an immediate economic benefit in the lowering of taxes through the decrease of armaments, but they can have a far vaster spiritual benefit if they are considered as only the first step toward a deliberate and earnest co-operation among the nations which must be promoted by every power of conciliation and good-will. Tentatively at least, the American Government is feeling its way toward a far larger measure of international accord than seemed likely a year ago.

THE CHURCH AND PUBLIC OPINION

As upon the threshold of the New Year, we ponder the opportunity of the Church for larger service, we may well listen to these words from John H. Finley, chairman of the Federal Council of the Churches' Commission on International Justice and Good Will:

"The bold and noble policy for the reduction of navies announced by Secretary Hughes at the opening session of the Conference on Limitation of Armament may well prove to be the beginning of a new day in our international life. This far-reaching proposal was made possible by the nation-wide tide of public opinion which has supported the calling of the Conference and which has made it as clear as daylight that the people everywhere are not only ready for a thorough-going reduction of armament, but insistent that it should be no longer delayed. In developing and expressing this public sentiment, the churches have played a memorable part. Even the most critical could not declare that on this issue they have been either indifferent or ineffective. In fact, it is not too much to say that they have been one of the decisive factors in setting our nation before the world as the outspoken advocate of the abandonment of the policy of competitive armament.

"But the work of the churches in behalf of a more Christian international life is not finished; it is only beginning. To mistake proposals for achievements would be a perilous mistake. Above all things, we must now be on our guard against being betrayed into complacency or inaction. We must support the Conference with the utmost vigor until it actually adopts constructive plans. We must then continue our campaign of education through the churches until Congress has taken action that will put those plans into operation concurrently with other nations.

"The currents of reaction and skepticism may begin to set in at any time. In the fact of these misgivings the Church must sustain a lofty faith in the possibilities of the Conference for practical achievement and the workableness of a positive substitute for super-armament and war.

"The complex and delicate problems of the Far East are still to be considered. They can be solved at all only as they are approached with largeness of vision and in an attitude of generous co-operation. The Church must, therefore, create a spirit which will make it possible both to secure the future welfare of China and at the same time to maintain the utmost friendliness with Japan.

"As the Conference goes on it will, no doubt, become increasingly clear that something more than reduction of armament is necessary. This, aftter all, is only the negative side of the question. Some arrangement will have to be found for assuring the sense of security and of the possibility of obtaining justice for which men have looked to armaments in the past. This will require a willingness on the part of America to join in permanent co-operation with the other nations in the support of international courts and some continuing association for future conference and the maintenance of peace. To develop an underlying conviction of the solidarity of the human race, to make men see that we are members one of another, and to inspire them to act according to this Christian point of view—surely that is a permanent task of the Church and one which was never more challenging than now."

THE RELEASE OF EUGENE DEBS

President Harding exhibited the biggest element in his character—the instinctive wisdom of a good heart—when at Christmas time he released from prison Eugene Debs and other political offenders. We are glad that he did it, and think the more highly of the President because he was not swerved from his purpose by the protest of the American Legion and of others who sought to forestall what he had in view.

Philip Gibbs, who saw the realities of war as few other men have seen them, wrote in the concluding paragraph of his "Now It Can Be Told": "The new vision" leads men on, and if we can make one step that way it will be better than that backward fall which civilization took when Germany played the devil and let us all into the jungle. The devil in Germany had to be killed. There was no other way, except by helping the Germans to kill it, before it mastered them. Now let us exorcise our own devils, and get back to kindness toward all men of good will. That also is the only way to heal the heart of the world and our own State. Let us seek the beauty of life and God's truth somehow, remembering the boys who died too soon, and all the falsity and hatred of these past five years. By blood and passion there will be no healing. We have seen too much blood. We want to wipe it out of our eyes and souls. Let us have Peace."

It is because we echo with all our hearts the message which is writtten in these words that we are glad of the President's release of Eugene Debs. It is true that Debs did all that he could to hinder the prosecution of the war; it is true that by the laws of the United States and in the terrible exigencies of the nations' struggle he was justly condemned and justly sentenced; but, even so, Debs has not wrought so deep a hurt to the cause for which America fought as have men like George Harvey and others who have besmirched the idealism that America carried in her soul. Debs, by his opposition to the war, would have weakened the morale of the nation for the prosecution of the war. Others, who have boasted of their 100 per cent. Americanism, have weakened the morale of the nation for the great, constructive purposes which ought to have followed the war's conclusion; and, to our mind, his sin is less than theirs. He was an idealist, and his protest against war was due to a great loyalty to what he felt to be the far ends of humankind. We need today to understand the value of all voices that protest against the dreadfulness of war. We have, as Philip Gibbs well says, "seen too much blood. We want to wipe it out of our eyes and souls. Let us have Peace."

THE MARVEL OF THE HUMAN SPIRIT

Three Books Which Reflect the Many-Sidedness of Life

ROOSEVELT IN THE BAD LANDS.

No public man within living memory, and perhaps none in the history of America, roused more vehement emotion than did Theodore Roosevelt. He had a multitude of admirers who kindled at the very mention of his name and saw in him the embodiment of all that they loved best in the spirit of America. There were others who hated him with a furious detestation and found no epithets too indignant to hurl against him. But these violent differences which he provoked had to do with his political career; and there was one aspect of the man upon which, even when partisan passions ran highest, all who thought of him had to agree. He was certainly a superb incarnation of human energy—a figure so virile, so buoyant, so overflowing with the impetuous joy of being alive that he made everybody who came in contact with him realize that life can be tremendously bigger than the half-spirited thing so many make of it. In the sturdy American sense he was a whole man—and a man's man. He had dash and courage and physical daring, and he carried the abounding spirit of youth about him perpetually. His friends loved him and thrilled to him because of that; even his enemies recognized it. And now that death, and the healing of time, have assauged the old partisan passions, all Americans, no matter what their political affiliations, can take delight in a story that tells of the Roosevelt of the Western plains, the ranch-owner and the friend of cowboys, the sharer on equal terms in the hardships and hazards of the frontier.

Such is the story which Herman Hagedorn tells in his "Roosevelt in the Bad Lands." This is the first of the publications made possible by the Roosevelt Memorial Association, and wisely did the committee choose when they selected Hagedorn. Other men through the scenes of the Roosevelt country, traveled through the scenes of Roosevelt's life, met and talked with the men whom Roosebelt knew—all of which Hagedorn did; but not many men could have poured the material of information thus gathered into the flowing narrative, flashing with descriptions of great beauty, which this author has achieved. For Hagedorn is—as students of contemporary literature know—first of all a poet; and he has translated the poetry of the great spaces and the lilt of exultant life, into his prose. His book will help perpetuate the memory of that Western border where, as Roosevelt himself described it, men "knew toil and hardship and hunger and thirst; saw men die violent deaths as they worked among the horses and cattle, or fought in evil feuds with one another; but felt the beat of hardy life in the veins * * * and the glory of work and the joy of living."

Through Hagedorn's narrative move the figures of Joe Ferris and Sylvane Ferris and Merrifield, to whom, with no scrap of security, Roosevelt could trust thousands of dollars in the management of his ranch; Joe Ferris and Lang and Bill Sewall, Frank Vine, who was "perfectly willing to do anything for anybody at any time except to be honest, to be sober or to work"; Bill Williams, the saloon-keeper, "who was deathly afraid of being alone, and had a habit on those infrequent occasions when his bar was for the moment deserted, of setting the chairs in orderly rows as in a chapel, and then preaching to them solemnly on the relative merits of King Solomon and Hiram, King of Tyre"; Jake Maunders, who "was too crooked to sleep in a round-house," and others of that strange assortment of strong men, brave friends, desperadoes and ruffians with whom Roosevelt worked and played, or against whom he matched wits and daring in the rough-and-ready testing of the border. Against it all is the background of the Dakota prairies, the buttes and coulees of the Bad Lands, the mighty spaces of the skies where "in the soft springtime the stars were glorious in our eyes before we fell asleep," and winter, with its blizzards of driven snow-dust, and rivers "treacherous with quicksand or brimmed with running ice."

The vividness of interest of the book are greatly heightened by many illustrations from beautiful, clear photographs.

ROMAIN ROLLAND, THE MAN AND HIS WORK.

A brilliantly written biography of one of the most extraordinary writers of our time.

Thus in one sentence might we sum up the nature and quality of this book, except that the wideness of the interest which it has a right to claim is not sufficiently indicated by speaking of Rolland only as a "writer." He is far more than the author of certain volumes, even though among them be one so masterful as "Jean Christophe." He is among the seers and dreamers of this generation; and those who may never have read a single line he has written, and are possessed therefore of no particular literary curiosity as to Rolland the author, will nevertheless find this biography inspiring because of the story it tells of a human soul who sees a vision of excellency and truth, and has proclaimed, to a world that needs to understand it, the beauty of the thing he sees.

We have had in these last years much fierce beating of the drums of nationalism. We have had men by the millions struggle and die for loyalty to country, and old instincts within us have thrilled to the nobility of that. But more and more there has been an uneasy consciousness of something else that was being crucified—a loyalty to humanity which was done to death between the clashing swords of rival patriotisms, a motive of love and service which was burned by the heaped-up fagots of hate. Our world being as it is, we have not seen how we could avoid war, since it seemed to come to us as the only alternative to an ignoble acquiescence with evil; but the conscience of thoughtful men has come to be sure at least of this—that our human folly and sin are to blame that such a dilemma should occur. There is enough intelligence and good-will in the human race to build a civilization in which wars will not be necessary, if enough men set themselves to stimulate that intelligence and promote that good will. This is what Rolland has believed, and for that end he has striven with faith and courage that refuse to be dismayed.

Zweig's biography is written with an eloquent fervor. To him Rolland is one of the "moral phenomena of our age."

Romain Rolland was born on January 29, 1866. Zweig describes his childhood in the little town of Clamecy, and his love of music through which he entered "into communion with the worldless speech of humanity," and the "all-embracing sympathy of the life of feeling (which) enabled him to pass beyond the narrows of town and of province, of nations and of era." * * * "The other saint of his childhood's days, Shakespeare, likewise belonged to a foreign land. With his first loves, all unaware, the lad had already over-stridden the bounds of nationality."

From Clamecy, Rolland is taken by his father and mother to Paris to go to school at the Lyceum of Louis the Great, and afterward to the Normal School. After graduation, he goes to Italy on a fellowship, comes back to Paris as a professor of music, and then, after a time, gives up teaching to devote himself wholly to writing—long cycles of dramatic compositions which his biographer reviews briefly but very luminously. For a long time he labored in complete obscurity, pursuing his own ideals with unflinching faithfulness, campaigning against the cheapness of Parisian literature and drama, at first without effect, but becoming at last—so his biographer holds—"no longer author, poet or artist. No longer does he belong to himself. He is the voice of Europe in the season of its most poignant agony. He has become the conscience of the world."

Woodrow Wilson.

Woodrow Wilson was clothed with supreme power for utterance and for action on behalf of America through the most tremendous years which modern history has known. What he was, what he did, and what he failed to do, are elements inwrought into the life and destiny of the entire world. A completely revealing biography of him would have an interest and value beyond measure. What were the full motives, what were the ideals, what was the truth which shall be invincible, and what were the human errors that must fail, in the policies of this man who wielded for a time more authority than any other single figure among the nations? What thoughtful student, seeking not partisanship, but reality, has not longed to know the real answers to these wonderings; and who has not desired it the more now that the figure of Wilson moves in the world, but not of it, covered by a veil of silence, possessed of the secret of his own soul, while the clamour of shallow praise and denunciation dies and men confronting that silence wonder what is the truth concerning him and the work he sought to do.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING

By the Rev. Robert MacDonald Kirkland

THAT congregational singing is important as an aid to worship needs no demonstration. Yet there stand out two experiences which prove this fact to a surprising degree.

At a baptism of Menonites the congregation had assembled by the bank of the stream. As the candidates came walking across the fields a hymn was sung, one stanza by the congregation and the next by the candidates. The hymn had a strong rhythm and seemed interminable. As the singing continued, the emotional effect of the singing was almost overpowering. These people believe that baptism is real only when the candidate receives it in a state of religious ecstacy. More than anything else the continued singing of this hymn contributed to that ecstacy.

Another instance of deeper religious import was at a time of imminent peril. Those who faced it were many of them hardened men who might have seemed callous to religion. They turned not to prayer, nor to their Bibles, but to a hymn. In it they voiced all their confession, their contrition, and their own helplessness. That hymn was Newman's "Lead, Kindly Light." After that hymn they faced the danger without a murmur and with a bravery they had not shown before.

If singing had this power, it is an important part of worship. And if it is properly used it can contribute in no small degree to the helpfulness of the service. Some people are deaf to its appeal and some seem to find in music their natural expression in worship. Many a minister would acknowledge that the way in which the hymn preceding the sermon was sung had a distinct effect on his success in imparting his message. On the other hand, an organist would say that on the effect of the sermon depended the willingness of the congregation to sing the closing hymn.

The problem under discussion is how to obtain congregational singing. This can be divided into the accompaniment and the training of the singers.

I think the average member of a congregation likes to sing, but he does not sing because he is terrified by the sound of his own voice. This means that the accompaniment should be powerful enough to give him confidence. The organ is an important consideration. For a small church a reed organ is more satisfactory, because it is easier to play and less likely to get out of order. But even here there are good reed organs and bad. They can be of strong, clear and agreeable tone. They may easily be the reverse of this. A great array of stops does not necessarily imply a powerful organ. An organ of good tone is worth its price.

Suppose the congregation purchases a pipe organ. The builders of organs are not always honest. On paper the specifications of a low-priced organ seem satisfactory. Yet I well remember when such an organ was installed, only to be taken apart within six months because it had been built of wood improperly seasoned.

It would be a great mistake to put in an organ too small to give a strong support to congregational singing. I spoke of specifications. They are hard for a layman to understand, and it would pay to consult a well-known organist. One trick in a cheap organ is to use the same set of pipes under another name on a different manual. This is called borrowed stops, and is a highly unsatisfactory scheme. One essential for any organ is variety of tone. There is nothing more fatal for singing than an accompaniment that cannot show expression and difference in tone. Sometimes the fear is expressed that the larger organ is too difficult to play. As a matter of fact, a three-manual organ is easier to play than a two-manual, and a two-manual than a single manual. While the most difficult thing of all is to obtain any variety on a very small organ.

Suppose the organ is not satisfactory and the question is how to make the best of it. If the accompaniment seems thin and weak there is an organist's trick that may help. The music written for hymns calls for four notes at a time. This is perfectly satisfactory on a good organ. If on a poor organ this chord is filled in from base to treble, using six, seven or eight notes, the accompaniment will be surprisingly improved.

Next to the organ in importance comes the organist. Congregational singing depends more on him than on any one else. And generally he knows it. His is a more difficult task than the layman supposes. On a piano there is the problem of the co-ordination of the work of the hands. The organist must co-ordinate the work of his feet and his hands, he must manipulate the stops, he must achieve expression in his playing on an instrument that does not always permit of much expression. And if his playing is mechanical, lacks spirit and fire, there is no hope of congregational singing. Spirit and fire are obtained only by nervous effort. He is normally high-strung and temperamental. Very often the more temperamental he is, the better organist he is; the more difficult he is for the rector to manage. Most of the difficulties come from neither being able to see the viewpoint of the other. Very often such an organist is conceited and forgets that the church is not an auditorium, forgets that the aim of his music is to aid worship and to be apparently extremely subordinate in the service. Here the minister faces difficulties. If they both can agree on the same interpretation of the service, there should be no further difficulties, and no annoying restrictions should be put on the organist. It is very easy for a minister to be unconsciously inconsiderate. Delays in choosing the hymns, delays in telling of any change in the service; these are annoyances that loom mountain high. If the organist can be trusted, perhaps the best course is to leave the choice of the music to him, telling him the subject of the sermon and the aim of the service.

There are some mistakes which an organist can make which tend to discourage congregational music. The untrained singer knows too little about breathing to sing very fast or very slowly. The organist may then be careless in the tempo he sets. The congregation may be habitually flatting. The organist can cause this by using a sixteen-foot stop. The tone of these stops is blurred. He can correct this by adding to his combination a four-foot stop. These stops have the advantage of accentuating the pitch. This may seem rather technical, but it is given to aid in finding and correcting defects.

If congregational singing is desired, the music should be in the pews. That is the object of the proposed hymnal. Our Church seems far behind other churches in seeing the necessity for this. Unless the hymn is in a particularly low range, it is impossible for altoes and basses to sing the air. If the men were in full attendance this would mean about one-half of the congregation unable to sing without seeing the music. Suppose the purchase of hymnals with music is impossible. There is left the Mission hymn-book with music, and cheaper than that there is a collection of 150 of the Church hymns with music, together with music for the chants and the Communion Service, which may be had for 20 cents a copy of the Parish Press, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Given the right sort of organ, a good accompanist, and the music, the next problem is the actual singing. The choir may object to congregational singing, and it often does. The problem here is to compromise. If the whole service were sung by the congregation, the choir would feel no excuse for its existence, interest would lag, and numbers would diminish. If the choir were willing that the congregation sang the hymns and simple chants, there would still be left the Te Deum and a morning and evening anthem. We might not want an elaborate Te Deum, and yet it might be wise to encourage the singing of it. Choirs must be given an incentive for rehearsals, and a certain amount of elaborate music should be encouraged.

The make-up of a choir is a difficult matter. Suppose it is a mixed choir. Should it be in the front of the church or in the rear? Probably for congregational singing better support for the congregation could be given from the rear. Few choirs can be held together without some incentive, the opportunity of working under a good teacher or else its being partly a social institution. Every effort should be made to secure the best possible choir trainer. This done, it should not be difficult to have a large volunteer choir. Here it might be suggested that choirs, like organists, are temperamental and should be treated with tact. One remarkably good choir in a country village was wrecked by the protests of two elderly ladies against the elaborate Easter music. Probably the music was too elaborate. But the choir had tried to do its best, and certainly the two elderly ladies could not replace the outraged choir.

In spite of the articles in the Church weeklies that have advocated it, the boy choir in the country is almost an impossibility. They need extremely careful training. Not many voices are worth this training. So unless the sight of the boys in the chancel is the important object, as far as singing and as far as leading the singing of the congregation, they are more than likely to be failures.

It is always well to have an auxiliary choir. The members of this choir can be used to fill the gaps in the regular choir and to lead in the singing of the congregation. One large city church used to scatter such a choir through the congregation so that all through the congregation there were singers, and that the rest of the congregation might take courage and also sing.

Another place where the music must be developed is in the Sunday school. If this were done gradually we could approximate the singing of the English parish churches, where the entire congregation sings, not with deafening heartiness, but musically and sweetly.

To keep all these organizations together it might be well to form a village choral society. There should be dues required, because free training is not usually appreciated. The best trainer obtainable should be engaged and the results would then be found to repay amply the expense. There are small country towns where the Messiah is sung annually, and the whole village is helped. There are easy cantatas which are good music and simple anthems which are almost cantatas like those particularly of Sullivan.

Now as to the music to be sung by the congregation. Canon Douglass advocates Plain Song. I remember well the only rebellion I had from one choir was when I wanted them to sing some Plain Song. It is good music, but the average congregation should be brought to Plain Song gradually. The same thing applies to Gregorian chants, which were written for men's voices and are most effective when sung by men.

There are hymns dear to the heart of us all, but there is always the danger of falling into a rut. A narrow choice will make the singing dull and kill the interest in the singing. We could get a good lesson from the singing in revivals. Congregational singing is stressed. A large chorus choir is drilled. New hymn-books are used. They are eagerly bought and the people set themselves to work to learn something new, and how they do sing it! Please remember I did not call this something music. But it would not hurt us to make a point of singing a certain number of new hymns. We never do seem to explore the possibilities of our hymnals. Our present book has many a wonderful hymn that is unfortunately unfamiliar.

One suggestion. Before the evening service some churches do make a point of having the congregation sing a few well loved hymns, and the singing of these seems to be as much a part of the worship as the rest of the service. There are churches where it might be helpful.

To have congregational singing the people should be made to feel that they are responsible for a portion of the singing. They should be well led. They should have all the encouragement of seeing the music, of an inspiring organist, and of a good organ.

HISTORIC CELEBRATION

Two Hundred Years in a South Carolina Parish

THE people of the Parish of Prince George, Winyah, in Georgetown County, S. C., have just completed in a worthy and beautiful manner the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the parish, which was created by Act of Assembly as a separate legal entity in 1721, but whose records go back to a considerably earlier date as an integral part of the mother Parish of St. James, Santee.

The list of subscribers to the building fund includes many names of families still prominently active in the affairs of the parish, among them Henry Bossard, John Brown, Anthony White, James Lesesne, Jonathan Skrine, Daniel LaRoche, George Pawley, William Alston, Joseph LaBruce, Arthur Foster, William Ramsey, William Waties, Thomas Belin, William Bull. The Rev. Thomas Morritt promised to give the communion plate. It consists of a flagon, a chalice, a paten and basin, on which is engraved the inscription, "Protestant Episcopal Church, Georgetown, S. C." The site on which the church stands was donated for the purpose by the Rev. William Screven, the first Baptist minister to come to Carolina, and his son, Elisha Screven, who received from the crown a grant of land on which the city of Georgetown now stands, and who laid off straight and wide the beautiful streets of which the city can justly boast. Dalcho, writing in 1920, tells us that during the Revolution the interior of the church was burnt, but "it has since been completely repaired and made more commodious and decent for the public worship of God." From the same source we find that in 1717 "the population of Prince George's was computed at upwards of 500 Christian souls, besides Indians and negroes."

It was during the period just preceding the War Between the States that the Parish of Prince George rose to its greatest heights of power and influence, when the wealthy rice planters and their families were among the chief communicants, contributing liberally of their means, and high characters and abilities, to the maintenance and work of the church. Various and many persons assumed the rectorship of the parish in the passage of time, good, bad and indifferent. Coming down to a later date, we find that the Rev. Maurice H. Lance was ordained deacon in 1815 by Bishop Theodore DeHon. He was a man of lovely character, whose descendants are among the most honored members of this parish. The first recorded parochial baptism was that of Thomas William Henning, on December 24, 1815, in the handwriting of Mr. Lance. The first confirmation recorded was that performed by the Rt. Rev. Theodore DeHon, Bishop of the Diocese, on November 17, 1818. The Rev. Mr. Dalcho concludes his sketch with the statement that "the church is flourishing both in its spiritual and temporal concerns." Paul Trapier Keith served as rector, following the encumbency of the Rev. Mr. Lance, under whom he had served as assistant rector. The record includes the baptism of Anthony Toomer Porter, November 16, 1828, who afterwards became a priest of the Church, and who attained international fame as the founder and head of the Holy Communion Church Institute, known now as the Porter Military Academy, Charleston.

Later an entry in the Journal reads: "The rector left on the 23d day of February, 1865. On Saturday, the 25th, the town was occupied by the naval forces of the United States. Every precaution and care was taken to preserve the church property. On the resignation of Mr. Howard at this time, the Rev. Alexander Glennie was asked to officiate in the church every alternate Sunday, "the church to contribute all it could to his support." Resolutions full of faith and courage were passed by the vestry to keep the doors of the church open as best they could, and the Rev. Alexander Glennie was called and accepted the cure. His ministry during those trying times seemed providential, for he stimulated the religious life of the entire community to bear its misfortunes.

The Rev. Benjamin Allston became rector in 1882, and continued in charge until 1887. He was a son of Governor Robert F. W. Allston, a graduate of West Point Military Academy, and after making a name for himself under the flag of the Confederacy, on his return home after the surrender, felt the call to the service in the ministry. Mr. Allston was succeeded by the Rev. Stewart McQueen, who served the parish ably until the summer of 1892, when he resigned to accept a call elsewhere. He was succeded by the Rev. John B. Williams, then rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Orangeburg. He resigned in 1898. Mr. Williams was a profound scholar and thinker, and his sermons strong and stimulating.

A call was then extended to Rev. G. H. Johnston, D. D., then extended to the Rev. George H. Johnston, D. D., who was elected December 11, 1898, and served the parish faithfully and well until the infirmities of years rendered him physically unable to serve longer, when he was retired as rector-emeritus. Rev. Percy J. Robottom was elected rector January 29, 1911, and remained in charge of the cure until his resignation February 1, 1916. The Rev. John S. Lightbourn, the present beloved rector of the parish, was elected by the vestry on March 21, 1916, and on June 19, 1916 (Trinity Sunday), he preached his first sermon in the parish church. His ministry has brought about a plainly visible broadening and deepening of the spiritual life of the parish, and continuous growth and expansion is evident in every department. It is due to his great interest in all that pertains to this parish, that the bi-centennial celebration became thoroughly and widely noted, resulted in a commemoration of the event in a way that has left a deep and abiding impression upon all those who were present. Great crowds attended all the services.

Celebration of the Bi-Centennial.

The bi-centennial celebration of the Parish of Prince George, Winyah, was opened Friday evening, December 2, with a reception in honor of the distinguished visitors here to participate in the exercises of the auspicious occasion. The Hon. Walter Hazard delivered the historical address covering the 200 years of the life of the parish, and from months of research into the archives and the well springs of his own memory as a communicant for many years, he has produced a store of valuable information in a form that will henceforth remain a work long wished for, but seemingly unattainable until the present rare occasion brought it forth. The facts in the preceding sketch have been largely taken from this address of Mr. Hazard's. It will soon be available in pamphlet form, for the benefit of parishioners and others interested. Addresses of welcome were made by Dr. R. W. Lide, the Baptist minister, representing the local Ministerial Association, and James W. Wingate, Mayor of Georgetown. Bishop Guerry arrived from the train late, and in response to a call, made a humorous and happy little talk of a few minutes' duration. The Rev. Mr. Lightbourn, rector of the parish, presided over the meeting. Afterwards the ladies of the church served delicious refreshments, and there was a pleasant commingling socially. The scene of the reception was the fine old Winyah Indigo Society Hall, and it was well attended.

On Saturday evening at 8 o'clock a "Quiet Hour," in preparation for the Holy Communion, was conducted by the Bishop, a large congregation being present. It was indeed a service of consecration and inspiration. The following clergy occupied places within the chancel railing: The Rev. Stewart McQueen, of Montgomery, Ala.; the Rev. Alexander Mitchell, of Greenville, S. C.; the Rev. John E. H. Galbraith, of All Saints', Waccamaw, and the pastor, the Rev. John S. Lightbourn.

Which Are You?

(By a Layman.)

Can a man be a Christian and not be a member of the church?

Some people say he can.

These are, as a rule, the same people who like to argue that God can be worshipped just as devoutly in the great out-of-doors (by which they mean, usually, a golf course or a picnic ground) as in a church.

They are the advocates of painless religion.

They talk of "breaking away from creeds and dogmas," and think that in this way they demonstrate a beautiful type of broad-mindedness and tolerance. They believe profoundly in natural laws, but they do not like to think about spiritual laws, because that would mean thinking of obligation and duties and sacrifices.

Ninety-nine times out of a hundred such a person will say that he is a Christian, and very likely he believes that he is. But when you examine his beliefs for traces of real Christianity, you find that he is what might be called a Christian by default.

That is to say, he is a Christian because he is not a Jew or a Mohammedan or a Buddhist. His credentials are all negative.

Now, as a matter of fact, it is not possible to be a Christian and not be a member of the Church of Christ. The Church is not a vague abstraction, but an organization of human beings formed under divine auspices. Being an organization of human beings, it has the weaknesses inherent in human nature. Being divinely founded, it has the power to overcome those weaknesses.

But the short-sighted man, the careless man, the lazy man, sees the weaknesses and overlooks the divine power.

* * * *

Saying that a man must be a member of the Church to be a Christian does not mean that he must be a member of any particular branch of the Church. The Church has many branches, and the differences among them are the differences that cannot be avoided in a society which numbers many millions of people.

Some people like to worship in one way, some in another. Some think the Church should have its affairs administered along one line, some along another. Different branches call the same thing by different names, and are happier that way.

To say that salvation is inseparable from certain forms of observance is to say something that is not true. Forms are superficial, but faith is essential.

And faith involves allegiance to the organization in whose hands Jesus left the task of going into all the world and preaching the gospel to every creature.

A churchman has a spiritual home. Any one who is not a churchman has at best a spiritual boarding-house, a temporary dwelling, transiently occupied. His beliefs are those of the time. His faith has roots that go no deeper than the current popular conception of what constitutes a good man.

The churchman who is really a churchman can say, "I believe." The non-churchman, fearful of spiritual authority, shrinking from definite obligations to a definite organization, can only say, "I think." There is a vast difference between being a follower of Christ and being, at a respectful distance, an admirer of Him.

Christ did not found a moral lecture course or an ethical uplift society. He founded a close communion based on spiritual fellowship and a common faith, and symbolized by certain definite sacraments. It was the passionate devotion of the early Christians to this fellowship that made it possible for the Church to triumph over all that at first opposed it.

Nothing but the same passionate devotion will give any of us the right to call himself by the name of Christian.

ON DOING LARGE THINGS.

It is quite right to plead with people to do what is large in respect to the planning of their lives, the development of their minds and souls, the extension of their work and influence, if only the rule of righteousness and charity is followed. Many of us would have to say that we wish we had planned larger things in the use of our lives, when we were younger. It is a time, however, which desires to do everything in a large way, to call every collection of money a drive or a campaign, to make the accomplishment of great results the test, to be impatient of what we call small undertakings, and small acts of service.

A good many men and women feel that they must be on some great board, in some great campaign, publishing bulletins of progress, or watchig a clock which registers financial gifts but not time. There must be a good deal of excitement and pressure to get people into the support of these campaigns, sometimes beyond propriety. Once we talked of hundreds of dollars, then we talked of thousands, now we pay attention only to millions and billions, and some people seem to think that the world will be saved out of sin and shame, for good religion, if only a very great sum of money can be raised and apportioned on strictly business principles.

One does not wish to be in opposition to these great plans, even when he feels that experience and training do not fit him for getting into the shouting throng. At such a time we need to remember that the progress of the Kingdom of God depends upon the prosecution of the work in a great many small places and in what are called small ways, that character and devotion, which are the main things to think about, do not come through drives. Let men and women do the largest things that they can, and have part in large charitable and religious undertakings, but let them not forget that the quiet cultivation of Christian virtues, the maintenance of the family and the home, regard for Worship and Sacraments, whatever makes for personal kindness and good will, the performance of the duty just at hand, the relief of the wounded man on the road, are the main things for most of us, and nothing shall ever come in as a substitute for them.—Newark Churchman.

Four things that I may happy be,
I pray that God will give to me;

Some one to love with all my heart,
Something to do by toil or art,
Something to hope for further on,
A mem'ry sweet to muse upon.

All these in Christ, my Lord, I find,
On Him, I rest with quiet mind.

—Bishop J. H. Darlington.

A REPLY FROM MR. FOSTER, AND A COMMENT.

Mr. Editor: In your recent editorial you state, "Whatever we think about the mechanics of the existing League of Nations, can we as Christians escape the compulsion of the great hope which idealists tried to incarnate there?"

As to the ideal, you and I are at one, and I think it is shared by Christian and infidel alike everywhere. The principle is eternally and everlastingly right, but it is impossible to put an abstract principle into earthly operation without mechanics. This principle has been in existence forever and known to man from time immemorial. It was expressed in the prophecy that the sword should be transformed into the plowshare. But to become effective it is essential to have the expert blacksmith and his tools. Even the angels' song of "Peace on Earth" was merely an abstract enunciation of little value without a Divine Instrument to give us an earthly manifestation of its earthly application and utility.

From the above letter-head (attorney at law for patent and trade-mark causes) you will appreciate that I am constantly concerned in the invention and development of new things—matters that relate to the discovery and application of natural principles and all of which require mechanical contrivances to make those principles useful to mankind. I feel, then, that I can speak with some knowledge, if not authority, on the subject. Never have I known of the initial production of an invention complete and perfect. The manifold present-day arts and sciences that contribute to our happiness and comfort have come through long years of wearying struggles, failures, discouragements, trials and disappointments. The underlying principles were there always. But the serious-minded men seeking to make such principles available to us had many strange, curious, impracticable and wrongful ideas in mind. Look back on the history of the development of any field of endeavor, and it is now amusing to see how far afield those seekers sometimes strayed. But through all those tribulations the correct solution was finally reached. And today you will find the first schemes that cost so much trial and effort, thrown into the discard. Visit with me the Patent Office and look over the development of any line that you may mention. Let us walk through the National Museum. There is the screw-press of Franklin. What is there today of it in the modern machine that runs off the Southern Churchman? There are Morse's quaint and crude telegraph instruments, Langley's aeroplane, Selden's automobile. Yet they teach us the lesson that they were essential stepping-stones to better things.

So do I feel about the League of Nations. The Hague Tribunal was a beginning and of little value, the existing League of Nations a machine invented, perhaps, in good faith for practically applying to human affairs a wonderful ideal, but mechanically wrong from a fundamental standpoint and therefore incapable of being made to properly function by revision and alteration. Now we have another set of inventors, including some of the former ones, working just as faithfully, just as earnestly, just as prayerfully on a new machine that appears to some of us to have wonderful possibilities and in which the vital defects of the second one, it is hoped, are being avoided. It will probably not be perfect. Nothing human is. But is it right for those who, because they hold whole-souled allegiance to the second, to condemn those who are thus striving, or even those attempting to encourage, the new workmen? It may be that the critics express a prayer with their lips, but alas! their pens seem dipped in vitrol.

Therefore I have no patience with nor will stand silent under such abusive outpourings as Bishop Parsons has seen fit to publish and you to approve. It was not only an attack upon honest, God-fearing Christians, who are seeking what they believe is a better way than that approved by you, but it was an unwarranted criticism of the present administration put into office by a vast majority of our fellow-countrymen, and, furthermore, is incidentally an arraignment of the form of government under which we live. If you consider Colonel Harvey an exponent of the extreme to which my ideas may lead, surely I am justified in calling Bishop Parsons an example of the extreme to which the pendulum swings on your side of the question. It did seem, and it still seems, a most unwise thing for a Bishop of our Church to thus arbitrarily condemn so many folk who differ with him. No, no, I cannot think the closing words of Bishop Parsons were really a prayer when I ponder over and compare it with those prayers that come to mind of One who gave us samples of what prayers should be and particularly for those who disagree with us.

So, if in my treatment of the Right Reverend, I showed myself to be the right irreverent, I still maintain I was right, if irreverent. I fear I therefore must still stand in your eyes an impenitent sinner.

I sent a copy of my former letter to Bishop Parsons. I will send a copy of this also. And unless something further appears to snap my resolution, I am through.

With the warmest regards, notwithstanding this difference of opinions,

BERTRAM G. FOSTER.

Washington, D. C.

[We regret that for lack of space we were obliged to omit about one-third of Mr. Foster's letter. In the part omitted he argues that we have not proved that the Federal Council of Churches really favors the existing League of Nations.

We have received other letters concerning our position about the League of Nations, one of them defending the League and assailing its enemies with such valiant indignation that we have been obliged to write the author that for the sake of peace we ought not to publish it.

Here, however, is a letter which the writer asked us not to publish, but which—with certain sentences omitted—we think it will not be a breach of trust to include, unsigned, as a part of this editorial note:

Thus it runs:

"I have always been in favor of the League of Nations. And I am inclined to think that the vast majority of American people were in favor of the League until a few of Mr. Wilson's enemies in Washington and elsewhere got busy.

"Mountains can be made of mole-holes. There was much fault found with the League, and many arguments brought forward trying to show to us why we should not enter into the League, but I have not been able to find a single reason that would stand.

"After the administration was sufficiently discredited (?) and the race for office was on from the President down, there was a general feeling about over the country that the Republicans would give us something better than the League of Nations, bring down the cost of living, and otherwise bring in the Millennium. And so the Wilson administration was defeated.

"I have traveled some, have read a great deal, and have observed still more, and I believe that all the time the rank and file of the American people have been and are in favor of the League of Nations, or 'something better,' and since nothing better has been offered for the past two or more years, if they were given a chance to express themselves, it would be somewhat in the tone of this letter. The worst part of it is—so far as I am personally concerned—I am a Republican, and voted for Harding."—Editor S. C.]

BIBLE TRANSLATIONS.

Mr. Editor: Many will read with satisfaction and approval the excellent letter of your correspondent from Greenwood, Miss. It is surprising that among the translations named no mention is made of the Twentieth Century New Testament, which, especially for the Epistles, will be found most helpful. This translation was prepared by scholars of the first rank, who along with scholarship show in their work a reverence due to the greatness of the task.

In their preface they mention a fact which is worth repeating, that since the Authorized Version fifteen hundred manuscripts have been discovered, and that among these there are three which are older than any that were in the hands of the King James translators.

In my humble opinion, nothing retards the progress of Christianity more than the disposition to make a fetish of mere words, regardless of any wish, which should be an eager wish, to know the real facts and the true spirit. True it is that by long association we may come to love the very form of words, and it is quite natural and right that it should be so, but it is not right that we should want to stick to any form of words or to any passages that fail to tell the truth of what was intended to be told.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

HOW DO YOU THINK?

"A Happy New Year."

It's a common expression, but one wonders if we realize all it means as we use it for our greeting to our friends on January 1.

Happy New Years do not come by accident. They are the result of constructive planning. In a way we are all builders using imperishable materials.

Some one has said that "he who builds with thoughts, words and deeds builds for eternity," and surely it is true. The sequence in which this, our material of the home of eternity, is named is worth considering—"thoughts, words and deeds."

Note it carefully; the thought is the foundation of the deed. No word is spoken, no action carried out, until it is conceived and born in thought.

To some people this is quite a new idea, so much so that when a cult or sect arose who laid the proper emphasis on right, wholesome and happy thinking, they called it "New Thought." They have published "New Thought" literature and organized "New Thought" chapters.

No doubt the idea that all action originates in thought is more or less new to some people, but it should not be so to Episcopalians, who have been accustomed to listen to that beautiful old prayer that leads us into the most solemn and inspiring of all our services, the Holy Communion.

Have you ever stopped to think of the true significance and importance of that dear old collect, "Almighty God, cleanse Thou the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit, that we may perfectly love Thee and all bitterness, unhappiness and despair.

There it is in a nutshell—the secret of a Happy New Year. If we will let God, yes and help God, to "cleanse the thoughts of our hearts," we shall certainly have that blessing which we so glibly pass along on New Year's Day.

On meeting we say, "How do you do?" It would be far wiser and is much more important if we said, "How do you think?"

Each one of us can have a Happy New Year if we will only remember the importance of thinking happiness and encouragement instead of despondency and despair.

It is not an easy thing to learn how to think properly, but it is one of the most worth while things to which we can give our attention.

Our wish and prayer for all our readers throughout the twelve months of 1922 is, "O God, cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit from all bitterness, unhappiness and despair."

REAL PROGRESS.

In our absorbing interest in the International Conference for the Limitation of Arms, we have almost lost sight of beneficent results of another gathering in Washington, which, though much less spectacular, has been almost as fortunate in its consequences as that which has attracted world-wide attention.

We refer to the Conference on Unemployment, and quote from the Survey what its secretary, Mr. Edward Ayre Hunt, thinks of its accomplishments:

"The following are some of the results of the Conference on Unemployment to date. (I write this on November 21, just a month and a week since the conference adjourned.) If the threat of a general railroad strike had not intervened, still greater progress would have been made in the follow-up work:

1. Public opinion, for the first time in American history, has been focused on unemployment.
2. Municipal committees are organized for the first time on a nation-wide scale to relieve it.
3. A national clearing house is ready to assist the municipalities, with district representatives in the field.
4. Industry is assuming a share of its responsibility to the unemployed.
5. Municipal bond sales for public works have broken all previous records.
6. Congress has inaugurated important public works.
7. A large appropriation for the United States Employment Service is before Congress.
8. A variety of other measures have been introduced in Congress to carry out the recommendations of the conference, such as Senator Kenyon's bill for long-range planning of public works.
9. Impetus is being given public education as to the nature of the problem of unemployment.
10. A scientific basis for future research is now being laid.
11. The construction industries are being organized nationally and locally under public direction, as, for example, in St. Louis.
12. In other notoriously seasonal and intermittent industries, such as the soft coal industry, stabilization studies are being planned.
13. A thorough investigation of methods for controlling the business cycle is in progress.

These cover the activities of a single month.

The national clearing house established by the President's Conference on Unemployment and placed under the direction of Colonel Arthur Woods, former Police Commissioner of New York and former assistant to the Secretary of War in charge of efforts to help re-establish service men in civil life, has greatly stimulated local activities. Of the 327 cities in the United States whose population is 20,000 or more, 209 have organized mayors' emergency committees in accordance with the recommendations of the conference, or have signified their ability to carry out the conference recommendations with machinery already in existence. Many of those cities not organized are so situated that there is no grave local problem. The co-ordination of municipal agencies to meet the unemployment crisis, expected to reach maximum intensity in January or February, 1922, is virtually complete.

Regional directors have been named, covering the more important industrial districts from Maine to Oregon.

"Clean-up" campaign in various industries, as recommended by the conference, have made rapid progress. The enlargement or renovation of plants and improvement in equipment are being ordered as a direct contribution to meet the emergency. There has been a general advance of industrial operations by employers, according to reports to the Department of Commerce, directly attributable to the work of the Conference on Unemployment. Mr. Hoover believes that 1,500,000, and perhaps as many as 2,000,000, men and women are employed today who would be unemployed if it were not for the work of the conference. There has been no general business recovery to account for so large a figure. The pick up may be temporary, but it is a good sign. This pick-up may be temporary, but it is a hopeful sign.

The Federal Highway Act, passed by Congress on November 3, makes available $75,000,000, which is to be matched by a similar amount from the States. By November 15 the Governors of 30 States had reported to us that within ninety days they can start 6,261 miles of highway, which will directly employ more than 150,000 men. How these State undertakings will affect the general condition of unemployment can be estimated from replies received from the Governors. Texas can employ 13,500 workers on an $8,000,000 road-building job covering 700 miles within the ninety days required. Georgia can provide 9,000 men with jobs on a $5,000,000 undertaking covering 360 miles of road. Indiana can use 5,800 men; Michigan, 5,600; Ohio, 5,300; North Carolina, 5,000; Minnesota, 4,350; Louisiana, North Dakota, South Dakota and Mississippi, 4,000 each.

Municipal bond sales for public works since the call for the conference was issued have broken all records. Over $60,000,000 in these bonds have been recently sold in thirteen States, and more than $34,000,000 have now been offered for sale. Besides, $10,000,000 in State bonds have been sold and an equal amount are offered for sale.

Totals for thirteen States amounted to $60,890,970 in municipal and township bond sales and $34,706,465 in additional bonds offered. The sales and offerings of bonds of the States of Illinois, Connecticut and Massachusetts are not included in these totals for municipalities and townships. The total amount of municipal bonds for public works issued was $113,787,230 for 415 municipalities.

The conference resolution on reclamation projects has resulted in the introduction of a bill carrying an appropriation of $20,000,000 to the reclamation fund for continuance of projects now under way. The prompt passage of this bill will give employment to more than 32,000 men.

The direct employment in all these instances represents only a part of the stimulus given to industry generally. Public works involve the use of many sorts of materials. The wages received will be spent on products which give business to retailer, wholesaler and manufacturer. Back of these again are the resultant orders on producers of raw materials. Authorities now state that the general principle is established that if, over a period of ten prosperous years, 20 per cent. of ordinary public works were deferred and the remaining 80 per cent. executed as usual, the lifting power of public works would be one-third the dead weight of such a depression as the present.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS

THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

The autumn group of sessions of the National Assembly of the Church of England opened on Monday afternoon, November 21, with a good attendance at the Church House, under the chairmanship of the Archbishop of Canterbury. After the customary opening prayers his Grace asked the Assembly to remain standing in silence. "We are," he said, "in the presence of great happenings in the world's life; things which affect, not the next five or ten years, but the generations yet unborn —the Conference at Washington and the prolonged conferences about Ireland. Let us lift up our hearts in silence to God to ask for wisdom and guidance for those who take counsel and for a right issue to all their deliberations."

Further Powers for Parochial Church Councils.

The earlier sittings of the Assembly were chiefly occupied by discussion of the Parochial Church Councils (Further Powers) Measure as revised by the committee which has charge of it. In the course of the discussions fears were expressed lest Parliament should be unwilling to accept the measure as it stands, and lest serious difficulties should arise in consequence. Upon this point the Guardian comments editorially: "We have often protested against this fear of Parliament. So long as the Church knows its own mind, so long, that is, as it can show that the measures of the National Assembly have behind them the support of large majorities. Parliament is very unlikely to take any action of which the Church might reasonably complain." * * *

Commenting upon the measure itself, the editorial has this to say: "Between them the two Parochial Church Councils' measures give the laity a degree of authority and a right of cooperation with the incumbent such as they have never before enjoyed. There may be friction here and there and certain misunderstandings, especially in the early days, but Parochial Councillors will be exceedingly unlike the majority of English men and women if they make silly fusses about small matters or endeavor to exercise their functions aggressively. We believe that the fears in this respect expressed in the Assembly by many members for whose opinions we have every respect will presently be shown to be unfounded. Certainly we do not expect to see the fulfilment of Lord Phillimore's humorous prophecy that a "Life and Liberty" presentee will be objected to as an ecclesiastical Bolshevist likely to fix a red flag on the church tower. Providence has so ordered the affairs of this world that our worst fears are rarely realized, even in the Church where 'worst fears,' strangely enough, do greatly abound. A little less pessimism and a good deal more faith would relieve us from our terror of Parliament on the one hand, and the fear of the parishioner on the other. A Church which is afraid has not properly learned the laws of its being."

The Crisis in Finance.

Lord Selborne moved: "That in view of the serious deficiency in the accounts of the Central Board of Finance, the Assembly directs it for the present to limit expenditure upon training to service candidates at Knutsford or elsewhere, and such civilian candidates as have already been accepted, and to close the Knutsford Test School as soon as may be consistent with the equitable treatment of all who are concerned." He made that motion, he said, with the greatest possible regret, and also with a sense of shame, because he thought it a terrible thing that the Church of England, through its central organization, should not be able to assist its poorer sons to seek training for ordination. But although he made his motion with regret and shame, he had no doubt that it was his duty to do so. He would be a very unfaithful servant to the Assembly if, without warning, he allowed it to get into a perfectly hopeless financial position.

The Archbishop of York, who presided at the later meetings of the Assembly, raised the point that the Church would always need some kind of test school in order to submit a certain limited class of men to the test which was necessary. It would be a great misfortune to the Church as a whole if there existed no test school for that purpose. If they were to have a test school it seemed to him unfortunate that they should "scrap" the brilliant leadership and experience which has been given by the test school at Knutsford. Would it not meet the case if the Assembly requested the Board of Finance to consult with the Central Advisory Council of Training for Holy Orders as to the possibilities of continuing the policy of training civilian candidates.

General consent was then given to substitute the Archbishop's suggestion for Lord Selborne's motion. The resolution as thus amended was put and carried.

Social Service.

The Bishop of London moved: "That a committee be appointed to consider the question of organizing, as a department of the Assembly's work, a Social Service Committee, to deal with the Church's relation to social work generally, especially with reference to moral and temperance work."

Unless such a step were taken, he said, they would be greatly misunderstood by the people of England. It was no doubt interesting for the Assembly to consider whether the Parochial Church Council should engage or 'sack' the bell-ringer and organist, and whether the Book of Tobit should be read in church, but so far the Assembly had not touched the imagination of England. They had not touched the social and moral life of England yet, and unless they had something that would do so they would fail as a National Assembly."

To the resolution put down by the Bishop of London, Mr. J. H. Higginson moved an amendment which would bring within the scope of the committee industrial questions, the committee "to suggest means by which the National Assembly may, as occasion demands, interpret to the nation the attitude and message of the Church in respect of urgent social problems." The Bishop of London expressed his willingness to accept this. A discussion ensued, and the Bishop of London's resolution was carried with only one or two dissentients.

The Spring Session.

The Assembly adjourned on Friday, November 25, to meet again on Tuesday, February 7, 1922.

The C. E. M. S. and Scarcity of Clergy.

The problem arising out of the scarcity of clergy and the fall in the number of candidates was discussed at a recent conference of C. E. M. S. diocesan union and federation secretaries at York, under the chairmanship of the Archbishop of York. It was estimated that England is now about four thousand clergy short, the number of ordinands during the last seven years having seriously diminished. The following resolution was passed, and a copy has been sent to each of the diocesan bishops: "This Council expresses its satisfaction at the advance which is marked by the new regulations (July, 1921), as to the use of lay readers in the services of the Church. Further, it is convinced that the time has come when the Church should make still further use of duly qualified and licensed lay readers, and thus lessen the disastrous effect of the unprecedented scarcity of clergy and candidates for Holy Orders in the Church at this time.

Reunion of the Churches.

A conference took place at Lambeth Palace on Wednesday, November 30, between the two Archbishops and certain other Bishops of the Church of England, and the members of the committee recently appointed by the Federal Council of Evangelical Free Churches, for the purpose of elucidating "certain expressions in the Appeal to ALL Christian People which may be felt to have an ambiguous character." After a discussion which had lasted for nearly five hours, it was agreed to appoint a small sub-committee representing the Church of England and the Free Churches to consider some of the issues which had been raised during the conference and to report.

Eastern Patriarch Favors Unity.

Through an interpreter, our New York correspondent has had a long talk with the Most Reverend Meletios, former Metropolitan of Athens, but elected the other day to be Patriarch of Constantinople. As is well known, there are five Patriarchs of the Holy Eastern Orthodox Church—Moscow, Antioch, Jerusalem and Alexandria, with Constantinople the primos, or spiritual head of all Churches of the East. The new Patriarch was Metropolitan of Athens under Premier Venizelos, but was forced out when King Constantine returned to Greece and to authority. He came to America, and has been in New York for some months. While there the Synods of the Eastern Church met at Constantinople and chose him to become its head.

His Holiness Meletios is an ardent advocate of union with the Anglican Communion, and eventually with all Christian Churches. He even believes the day will come when the Western Church will join with the Eastern, and repair the break of a thousand years standing. He pictures eloquently the evils of separation. He says the differences to be adjusted are small, and have been carefully considered by Eastern authorities. He says that for years they have prayed for union, but never felt warranted in making advances to the West, certainly not to America. When they heard, ten years ago, of the movement of the Church in America for a conference to consider unity, they thanked God their their prayers were in a way of being answered, and that from a source they had not dreamed.

Seminary Trustees Elected.

The following trustees of the General Theological Seminary have been elected by the alumni to serve for three years from January 1, 1922: The Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D. (1879), the Rev. J. Wilson Sutton, D. D. (1903), and Robert L. Gerry, of New York.

A New Concordance.

The American Bible Society is making a new departure in issuing a Concordance in addition to the Bible. For a century this society, which exists to publish and circulate the Bible "without note or comment," has printed the Scriptures without a Concordance; but since a Concordance is purely a key to the location of important words and passages, it is not in any way considered to be a note or comment, and, in response to requests covering many years, the Society has marked the first part of its second century of service by taking this forward step.

The work has taken over two years and has been done at very great cost.

VIRGINIA.

Rt Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. C. R. Page.

The Rev. Coupland Randolph Page died at Winchester on December 14, after many years of suffering, aged seventy-eight.

The funeral services were held Friday afternoon, December 16, at Christ Church, the rector, the Rev. Robert B. Nelson, officiating, assisted by the Rev. B. D. Chambers, rector of Christ Church, Millwood, Va. Burial was in Mount Hebron Cemetery.

Mr. Page was one of that large number of veteran Confederate soldiers, young at the time, who entered the ministry of the Church after the War of '61-'65: such men as Dudley, McKim, William Hoxton, William Dame, Newton, Gibson and others. Mr. Page graduated from the Seminary at Alexandria, and served churches in Virginia, Kentucky and Maryland. For many years he was chaplain of the First Maryland Regiment.

But quite early in his ministry he began to suffer from deafness, which eventually ended his active ministry in the Church. Since his retirement he has lived in Winchester, where, in later years, to his affliction of deafness was added that heaviest of all burdens, blindness. So that when death came to him, it brought rest to a long troubled and sorely tired soul.

The deceased was a member of the well-known Page family of Virginia, the son of the late Professor William Nelson Page, of Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va. He married Miss Ella Baker, of the large and influential family of that name in Winchester, a sister of Albert Baker, "whose praise is in all the churches" of this Diocese. Mr. Page was a brother of Mrs. Fannie R. Meredith, of Richmond. He leaves a widow, a son, Mr. Nelson Page, an active vestryman of the Church in Winchester; a daughter, Mrs. Randolph Shields, the wife of a medical missionary in China, and another daughter, Fannie, who devoted her life to loving care for her father in his years of helplessness, and won the admiration and praise of all who knew of her unselfish devotion.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

St. John's Church, Lynchburg.

Sunday, December 18, 1921, was a notable day in the history of St. John's. At the morning service the new extension and enlargement of the building and three beautiful memorials were presented to the church and dedicated.

While the building, as it now stands, is really planned to be ultimately the parish house in connection with a large church to be built later on as conditions require and finances permit, yet it is, with its new improvements, itself a beautiful little church. All of the new memorials are to be used in the new church when it is erected. The seating capacity has been greatly increased, an entirely new chancel built in the rear, a rector's study, small chapel and class-rooms have been added, and the capacity of the large room which is used for meetings of various kinds, social gatherings, etc., by the new arrangement is doubled. The total cost of building extension, memorials and equipment was $27,800. Of this the Executive Board of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia contributed $15,000.

The rector of St. John's, the Rev. George Floyd Rogers, and the members of the parish are doing a large and useful work in ministering in every way they can to the students of Randolph-Macon Woman's College.

In her per capita subscriptions in the Nation-Wide Campaign St. John's stands second in the entire Church.

The special memorials consist of the handsome altar given by the parish as a memorial to two sisters, deeply beloved members of St. John's, and intimately associated for many years in the social life of Lynchburg, Mrs. Virginia Goode Harris and Miss Channing M. Goode; the window, which really forms the reredos of the altar, a beautiful reproduction of Leonardo da Vinci's "The Last Supper," given in memory of the late R. G. Scott by his sons; and the marble font, given by Mr. and Mrs. W. Russell Winfree, in memory of their son, Henry Lee Winfree, Jr.

The members of the Parish Building Committee which planned the work were: Messrs. W. D. Mount, chairman; E. H. Wheat and W. K. Barger, Mrs. H. M. Sackett and Mrs. F. G. Davidson. The architect in the enlargement of the building was Mr. C. H. Hinnant, of Lynchburg. The memorials and choir equipment were executed by Charles R. Lamb, artist-architect, of New York.

At the close of the morning service Bishop Jett confirmed a class of twelve, of whom two were students of Randolph-Macon College.

Richlands Mission: The Richlands Civic Betterment League has recently donated a plot of ground to the Diocese on condition the Diocese shall erect thereon a building which shall be used for community purposes, etc., and on the further condition that the Diocese shall continue Deaconess Bertha B. Mills in her work there.

This is a distinct and well merited tribute to the faithful labors of Deaconess Mills, who has for some time been conducting the mission at Richlands and has, to a most gratifying degree, won the affection and the confidence of the people.

The Churchmen's League of Lynchburg has been reorganized, with Mr. John A. Faulkner as president and Mr. H. E. Steptoe as secretary. The League is composed of the men of the three congregations of Grace Memorial, St. John's and St. Paul's Churches. A program of very effective and useful work has been mapped out for the coming year. Within the League has been formed a Lay Readers' Guild, of which Colonel William King, Jr., is director. Colonel King and other laymen of Lynchburg have for a long time been rendering assistance to the rectors of several of the churches in Amherst, Bedford and Campbell Counties by holding lay services at times when these churches would otherwise have been closed. The purpose of the Lay Readers' Guild is to greatly extend this work and to induce and train new men to engage therein.

Christmas Observances.

Special music, midnight Christmas Eve services and carol services by the children of the Sunday schools were some of the outstanding features of Christmas observances by the churches in Washington. "The Dream of Mary," a cantata by Horatio Parker, was given by the choir of St. Margaret's Church on Sunday, December 18. This is the first time this cantata has been given in Washington. A Christmas pageant entitled "The Journey to Bethlehem," was given at Grace Church, S. W., under the direction of Mrs. Marie Moore Forrest, by the choir and others on Wednesday, December 28. Some of the churches having midnight celebrations of the Holy Communion on Christmas were St. Alban's, Christ Church, Georgetown, Epiphany Chapel, Trinity and the Church of the Incarnation.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rt. Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan.

Bishop Manning Preaches Farewell Sermon as Rector of Trinity: Dr. Stetson Inducted Into Office.

Bishop Manning preached his farewell sermon as rector of Trinity Church on the last Sunday in Advent. He expressed much feeling, saying he would never forget the event, and adding that no rector ever had more loyal people to work with. In this he included clergy and communicants of the pews. Speaking of the practical results of his ministry, he said:

"I like to think of the complete removal of all doubt or question as to the condition of our dwelling house property; the erection of the beautiful Chapel of All Saints' as a memorial to our beloved former rector, Dr. Dix; the erection of the Chapel of the Intercession and the buildings connected with it—one of the noblest groups of ecclesiastical buildings in the country; the freeing of the pews in Trinity Church, and throughout the parish, in thanksgiving to God for the victory given to the cause of justice and liberty in the great war, and, above all else, the growth of the spirit of fellowship and brotherhood throughout this great parish and in all its parts.

"We have made it our great aim, all of us together, to make this parish of Trinity a great centre of human fellowship in Christ, a great spiritual home for people of every kind and sort; and more and more the people have responded and claimed their full share in the life and work of the parish.

"Our debt, which some five years ago stood at about $5,000,000, as a result of which we have been for a time considerably straitened in our work, has now, through the admirable management of the vestry, been reduced to about $400,000, so that shortly the parish will be in a stronger financial position than ever, and able not only to strengthen its own work, but to give far more help, as the vestry are eager that it shall, beyond its own bounds to the work of the Diocese at large."

On St. Thomas' Day the Rev. Dr. Caleb R. Stetson, a former vicar, and for some years last past rector of St. Mark's, Washington, was inducted into office. This service was apart from the Prayer Book service of institution, and one that has been followed in Trinity for generations.

Patriarch of Constantinople Formally Received at Impressive Services.

At Evening Prayer on St. Thomas' Day, in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, Bishop Gailor, as representative of the Church, and Bishop Manning, for the Diocese of New York, formally received His Holiness, Meletios, Patriarch of Constantinople. With him were the Russian Metropolitan, the Russian Archbishop, the Bishop for the Greeks of North and South America, and the Bishop for the Syrians. The Bible lesson was read by Bishop Darlington, of Harrisburg. The Russian Metropolitan spoke briefly, and Bishop Gailor gave the final word and the blessing. Bishops Lloyd and Shipman were present.

Greek, Roumanian, Syrian, Russian, Arabic priests and people were in choir stalls and chairs, and the scene was most striking. The Patriarch leaves for Constantinople at once. All reports concerning opposition by the Turkish Government, or by the present Greek Government, are pronounced futile. The British Government has seen to it that religious liberty, and especially freedom of Christians from Turkish interference, obtains as conditions of the Turk remaining on the European side of the Bosporus, and the Greek prelates who opposed Meletios are controlled by King Constantine. Meletios announces that he will employ all power of the throne of the ancient Church to bring about unity with Christians of all other names.

A service held in the Russian Cathedral, with Bishop Darlington as the preacher, was intended to bring about better relations between the Russian and the Patriarch. From Peter the Great's time to the fall of the last Czar relations were strained, although the ecumenical character of the Patriarch was never questioned. The reasons were political. Immediately the late Czar was gone, steps were taken to heal the old sore, and the act occurring in the Cathedral, New York, was the first open step. Bishop Darlington traced the succession of the Anglican Church, and the Church in America, from the earliest times, and extended warm greetings to leaders in all of the national churches of the East, who were present. After the service, which was that of the blessing of the Holy Eucharist, there was a luncheon and a reception.

Growing out of the work of His Holiness, Meletios, while in exile in America, steps have been taken to organize the American Holy Orthodox Church, to include members of all Russian, Greek and other national churches in the United States. The communicant membership will be about 2,000,000, it is said. The first step was taken while the Patriarch was present. A head of this American Church will be elected as soon as possible.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

To Work for Hobart College.

Alumni of Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., in Philadelphia and vicinity met at dinner on Wednesday night, December 14, at the Art Club, to plan a campaign among their number and among friends of the college in Philadelphia, for subscriptions to Hobart's Million Dollar Centennial Fund. Hobart celebrates the hundredth anniversary of its founding next June, and has already raised half of the fund.

Mr. William B. Read, of Philadelphia, and the Rev. I. A. McGrew, of Germantown, are in charge of the campaign there. A campaign is now in progress in New York City, and the campaign in Chicago will start in January.

LOUISIANA

Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

Thirtieth Anniversary of Bishop Sessums.

The thirteenth anniversary of the consecration of the Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, Bishop of Louisiana, was observed by a banquet at the Louisiana Restaurant on December 9, 1921, given by the clergy and laymen of the Diocese, under the auspices of the Church Club of Louisiana.

Bishop Sessums was consecrated on June 24, 1891, as assistant to the Rt. Rev. John N. Galleher, Bishop of Louisiana, and upon the death of the latter in December, 1891, he succeeded him as the fourth Bishop of the Diocese. He now ranks as the fifth Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The president of the club, Mr. George M. Rogers, spoke of the love and esteem in which the Bishop was held by all Church people of the Diocese, and presented Mr. George H. Terriberry as toastmaster of the evening.

The Rev. Walter B. Capers, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Jackson, Miss., delivered an eloquent address as representing those clergymen who had formerly served in the Diocese.

Mr. Warren Kearny, secretary of the Church Club, spoke on behalf of the laymen of the Diocese, stressing the fact that the Bishop had always been most willing to co-operate with the laymen and to join with them in any movement for the advancement of the Church in the Diocese. As a token of the esteem in which the Bishop was held by the laymen, he presented him with a check for a substantial amount.

The Rev. A. R. Edbrooke, rector of Grace Church, New Orleans, who was ordained by the Bishop some twenty-eight years ago, and is the oldest clergyman in the Diocese in point of service, was the next speaker. On behalf of the clergy of the Diocese, he presented the Bishop with a token of their love and respect, and also asked the Bishop to convey to his wife the esteem and affection in which she was held by both the clergy and churchmen of the Diocese and to ask her acceptance of a gift from the clergy.

The Rt. Rev. George H. Kinsolving, Bishop of Texas, was the guest of the club and the principal speaker of the evening. He told of the friendship that had existed between him and Bishop Sessums for a great many years, and stated that there had always been a close bond of union between the Diocese of Texas and Louisiana. He referred to the fact that he spoke at the first annual meeting of the Church Club some twenty-three years ago, and that he had kept in touch with it ever since. He said it was a very great pleasure for him to be present at the anniversary and trusted that he might be spared to attend the golden anniversary of Bishop Sessums.

Bishop Sessums, in rising to respond to the various speeches of congratulation, was received with long and continuous applause. He said he was unable to adequately express his feelings of gratitude and appreciation at the reception given him, and for the gifts presented to him. He briefly interviewed the work of the Diocese since becoming its Bishop, and felt grateful to the clergy and laity for the help they had rendered him, laying much emphasis upon the work of the Woman's Auxiliary, which he said was very largely responsible for the remarkable growth in the missionary districts. The Church Club, he said, had been very helpful to him on many occasions, and he hoped that it would accomplish larger and greater things. He expressed the great pleasure it gave him to have Bishop Kinsolving present, being one of his oldest and dearest friends. He presented the call of the ministry in a very eloquent and forible manner, urging the fathers present to consider the sacred calling for their sons.

Many telegrams and letters of congratulation from some of the most prominent Bishops and clergy of the Church were read, amongst them being a letter from the Rt. Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and a telegram from the Rt. Rev. Thomas D. Gailor, President of the Council.

Delightful and very original songs, composed by one of the members of the Church Club, were sung during the evening by a splendid quartette and those present. The evening was a most delightful and enjoyable one, and the attendance numbered about one hundred and seventy.

MINNESOTA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. McElwain, D. D., Bishop.

Christ Church, Red Wing, observed its semi-centennial on December 18 and 19, with appropriate services conducted by the Bishop of the Diocese, the Bishop of South Dakota, three former rectors of the parish and the present incumbent, the Rev. Joseph N. Barnett. On Monday evening, December 19, at the Edward Randolph Welles Parish House, there was held an informal parish gathering, which was in the nature of a home-coming.

Collect for the Circumcision of Christ.

Almighty God, Who madest Thy blessed Son to be circumcised, and obedient to the law for man; Grant us the true circumcision of the Spirit; that our hearts, and all our members, being mortified from all worldly and carnal lusts, we may in all things obey Thy blessed will; through the same Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for the Epiphany.

O God, Who by the leading of a star did manifest Thy only begotten Son to the Gentiles, Mercifully grant that we, who know Thee now by faith, may after this life have the fruition of Thy glorious Godhead, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Prayer for the New Year.

Lord God, we lift to Thee
A world hurt sore,
Look down, and let it be
Wounded no more!

Lord, when this year is done
That wakes today
Many shall pray to Thee
Who do not pray;

Let all lips comfort them,
All hearts be kind,
They who this year shall leave
Their joys behind;

Give them Thy comforting,
Help them to know
That though their hopes are gone
Thou dost not go;

They who shall give for Thee
Lover and Son,
Show them Thy world set free,
Thy battles done!

Lord God, we lift to Thee
A world in pain,
Look down and let it be
Made whole again!

"I Make All Things New."

"Behold, I make all things fresh." This saying of God is eternally true. Everything appears in a fresh light if the Lord Jesus Christ as a Living Person is given the central place. Things that on earth seem worth while, the pursuit of money, or gain, or power, or pleasure considered in relation to Him, are of temporary interest. To become like Him, to do as He did, to think as He thought, to live as if He were interested, not merely as watching us, but as deeply concerned with us and our work, makes all the routine work of life new. The surroundings may be the same, the labor just as monotonous, or hard, or distasteful, but if He knows and cares, and sympathizes, how fresh it all becomes. You are earning your living not for yourself alone, but for loved ones dependent on you for daily needs—food, clothing, shelter. Is it merely that you and they may have these things, but no more? Surely not. It is so that they, too, may live their lives with Jesus Christ as the centre of gravity. For them as well as you He makes all things new.

Let us then follow the shepherds. Let us in spirit go with them to Bethlehem and see this thing which has come to pass. What do we find? A new-born Babe, attractive as all babies are attractive because of their helplessness and because of the hope, and because of their humanity. Let us look at these three as exemplified in Jesus Chist.

First, the helplessness. The Person is the Son of God as at this season made man for us men and for our salvation. The Lord of heaven and earth, by whom all things were made, has for the moment limited Himself by coming to dwell on earth among men, beginning where they all begin as a helpless babe for Whom everything must be done. The first appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ is one for whom men must do something, whom they must serve, to whom they must minister, for whom they must provide. Have we sufficiently thought of God as One who needs us and our efforts, not extraordinary efforts, but ordinary common things, food and clothes and personal attention from us? Does not He make all common labor new? Particularly that labor which is so often shirked by parents, the care of babies. The infant mortality even in Christian countries is excessive. A very practical thought for the New Year is a call to help in every way to remove the numerous preventable causes of much infant mortality. God needs our help for His helpless babes.

The second reason suggested for the attraction we all feel to a babe lies in the hope that it will become a man or woman, a grown-up person to take its place in the world of men and women, to share in the world's work, and, if it please God, in the world's progress towards God, not away from Him. The shepherds had been told that this Babe was to be a Saviour, Christ the Lord.

We look around us today and everywhere there is the same sense of failure, the same unrest because of dissatisfying conditions. We are crying out for leaders in Church and State. Men and women of vision who will right wrongs and deliver us from the intolerable burdens largely brought about by men's selfishness, by the greed of gain, by the desire to please themselves regardless of what it may cost to others. The more we analyze the situation the more it ultimately tones down to selfishness in us or some one else. All selfishness is sin. All such self-pleasing is the work of destruction, not of salvation. It is the opposite of God—for God is love. The hope of the Babe of Bethlehem is that He will be a Saviour and a leader, Christ a King, and because history shows us that all earthly systems of government are more or less faulty, we have the farther hope that He will rule as God. For the Babe of Bethlehem is the Lord and the Lord makes no mistakes. He is the Perfect Ruler because He is man in experience and God in Being.

The third reason suggested for the interest in babies is their humanity which we all share. In the Babe of Bethlehem we see the One who came to live as we lived; not as the more fortunate, rich and well to do, but as the child of humble parents, of people who had to work for their living. We often try to express sympathy, and those whom we would console and help turn from us because they feel our experience is not their experience. In the Babe of Bethlehem we see one who shared all human experience of temptation and suffering and poverty, and we rejoice because in Him we have the experience and knowledge and the power, and because He came for no other purpose than to make all things new in Himself.—Canadian Churchman.

Can a Man Save Himself?

Rev. Thomas F. Opie.

From birth to death man is dependent upon outside forces for his very existence. A man's grocer is actually his saviour. He mediates between man and starvation. His clothier is also his saviour, as the tailor stands between man and the elements and the seasons.

So are a man's doctor, his friends, his teacher, and his parents his saviours. They mediate between him and death and failure and ignorance on all sides. But for these intermediaries man not only could not succeed in life and go forward, but he could not survive infanthood.

This is apropos of man's need of a spiritual Saviour—an influence and a personal force, outside of and beyond his own will. Surely, if from a physical standpoint, man cannot "save himself," irrespective of industry and society, it follows patently that he cannot save himself in respect to the soul. Man cannot even save himself from himself! He cannot save himself from lust, from greed, from selfishness, and from sin and despair.

No man can be the best possible man, nor do the best possible work, nor reach the best possible destiny without Christ, the Saviour, and all that Christ means to character and the soul.

In the fifth century there sprang up in England what was known as the Pelagian heresy—the fallacy that man's will was sufficient to cope with sin and evil—that there was no need of a God, or a Christ, or a Holy Spirit, to reinforce man's will, to transform man's heart or to redeem man's life. Doubtless every adult living since that fallacy had its little day has exploded the theory of the spiritual independence and sufficiency of the unaided human soul.

"Vice is a monster of such horrid mien,
As to be hated, needs but be seen—
But seen too oft, familiar with its face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

As Saviour, Jesus Christ is the revelation of a new life (a new and higher pattern)—the inspiration of a new hope and the communication of a new strength. The life redeemed by the Christ is the best possible life; anything else is lacking in spiritual fiber. The work done in the spirit and power and love of Christ is the best possible work; any other kind is cold and mechanical and soulless. The destiny made possible by the Saviour and attained to through the inspiration and redemption of Christ is the best possible destiny; any other destiny is material, temporal and unworthy.

"Build thee more stately mansions, O, my soul"—but build them with the help of Christ, the Master Builder—Jesus, Good Paragon, the Crystal Christ—else they are destined to crumble and fall.

The New Year.

'Tis midnight's hour, and everywhere
Rests on the air
A holy hush,
As if the world in silent prayer
Were looking up to God.
And gently dropping, soft and white
As feathers in
Their downward flight,
The snowflakes fall, and veil from sight
The paths o'er nature trod.

And when the morning's golden beams
Shall rouse the world
From slumber's dreams,
O'er all the hills and vales and streams
A spotless robe shall lie;
A robe of unseen hands outspread,
A shroud to wrap
The old year, dead.
A clean page for the new, instead,
Dropped from the bending sky.

So, heavenly Father, may Thy grace
As kindly cover
Every trace
Of my sad wanderings from Thy face;
Let not one spot remain.
Before me lies the new-born year,
Each page as yet
All white and clear,
Oh, help me write it in Thy fear
And keep it free from stain.

Here, in the solemn hour, I raise
My heart to Thee
In thankful praise
For all the good that crowned my days
Throughout the old year, gone.
Unto the new I cannot see,
I know not what
'Twill bring to me,
I only know Thou lovest me
And still wilt lead me on.

The Hill Crest.

It was the evening of the last day of December. James Winslow and old Dr. Carter, his minister for forty years, sat together, watching the old year out. They had grown old together, these two. Seventy winters had sifted their snow upon their heads simultaneously. There was that deep understanding between them which is not afraid of a lull in the conversation.

Finally James Winslow stirred and spoke. "Well, William," he said, "another year is about gone, and they're getting fewer for us both. When the blood thins out and the years draw in, it isn't so easy to see the old year die, is it? I wonder if it's part of the declining courage of old age that makes me increasingly afraid to look at the past."

"You are in good company, James," replied the doctor, "when you want to forget the past. You remember Paul said, 'Forgetting those things which are behind.' Paul evidently found no profit in regretful reveries. I think he was right when he refused to be an antiquarian, digging up the fossils of dead faults. No nourishment is gained by chewing on that little quid. It seems to me that if a man has lived a fairly decent life, memory ought to act as it does when a man gets home from a journey abroad. It should leave out the inconveniences, the irritations and the fatigues of the journey, and treasure up the images of purple seas, sunny skies, vine-clad hills and ancient cities. Memory ought to yield us something like that from the pilgrimage of the soul. It ought to remind us of the providential guidance that has kept us in the way, the grace that has softened and sanctified our tribulations. Paul would be the last man to shut himself up in the damp mausoleum of souvenirs and regrets."

"But it strikes me," said the other, "that we ought not to have to fight shy of memory for fear it will break our courage. It ought to have something positive to offer us."

"You're in good company again there, James, for Moses says, 'Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee.' I think he is not strictly at variance with Paul. Moses believes that today's courage should be fed on yesterday's memory. He sees that yesterday and today are carved out of the same eternity, and one cannot be explained or understood without the other. It was memory that fed David's courage when he went out to fight Goliath: 'The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear. He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine.' We all leave our token of God's love in the year that will drive to its close tonight. And we ought to say with Samuel:

'Here I'll raise my Ebenezer,
Higher by thy help I'm come,

And I hope, by thy good pleasure,
Safely to arrive at home.'

"I suspect, too, James, that Moses saw some of his crosses transfigured as he stood at Nebo at the end of the trail and looked back from that vantage point. We are always looking for a revelation of God in the future. I wonder if the newest and best revelation is not just to pause at the crest of the hill and look back over the way God has led us in the past. I'm not much disturbed over the failures. I simply try to keep to the road, and let Him take care of the rest.

'For this is life: to love the light,
To see the best, to ask for all,
To seek a city out of sight,
In spite of failure and of fall.'"

—Youth's Companion.

This Coming Year.

I want the New Year's opening days
To fill with love, and prayer, and praise.
Some little thing to do for Thee,
For Thou hast done great things for me.

I want some other soul to bring
To Thee, my Saviour and my King.
Thou wilt not, Lord, my prayer deny,
For Thou canst all my wants supply.

In Jesus' name our prayer we raise,
Whose guiding hand has blessed our days.
And may we, Lord, in godly fear
Serve Thee through all this coming year.

Happy New Year.

The Psalmist says, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." True happiness is founded upon faith in God. I have seen the proud and godless man, strong and self-sufficient, bent and broken like a reed in the day of calamity. And I have seen the stricken saint calm and joyous in spite of pain. God is the anchor of the soul. It makes a difference when a person is "up against it," no matter what this "it" may be, if he is absolutely assured that divine love and power are taking care of him and will not fail him. One of the greatest of our missionaries, far away in Africa, burdened with a sense of loneliness, fell on his knees and prayed. And as he lay there he noticed a small flower, exquisitely beautiful. "God cares for that, even that," he thought, and he saw that the infinite Father cared also for him. What joy! There is happiness in truthfulness. Try it for the New Year. —The Expositor.

Friendship—With a Moral.

We quote the following, not knowing to whom to ascribe its first utterance.

"In an essay a school boy gave this definition of a friend: 'A friend is one who knows all about you and likes you just the same.'

"This is the divine definition of friendship, for it is written—'God commendeth His love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.' Knowing all about us, He still loved us.

"It is thus that parents are the friends of their children.

"It is thus that priests are the friends of penitents.

"What a reformation would be worked throughout the world; what achings of hearts would be soothed; what knitting up of severed friendships would be accomplished if the school boy's definition of friendship were more widely applied in Church, home and society, and criticism were dethroned by charity."—The Palm Branch.

This Year.

In this year, O, my Father, let me walk as a tender child smiling in Thy face! Let me know all the way that Thy hand is holding fast. And if, Father, the road shall be over hills, and stones shall bruise my feet, make me strong, even wounded, to advance. And should the way be through meadow lands where the singing birds play and the nights are lighted with Thy love, teach me then the clinging spirit of a child. Never let me esteem myself better than other men and keep me gentle all the way. Let each day go down in a forest of purple glory, giving signal that the day has spent itself in peace. And when the year shall have closed, re-enkindle the spirit of a little child and make me still to be smiling in Thy face.—William R. Owen.

Where Christ Is Born Again.

Wherever one repenting soul
Prays, in its agonies of pain,
By God's sweet grace to be made whole—
There, Christ is born again.

Wherever—bond of ancient thrall—
A strong soul bursts its shackling chain,
And upward strains to meet the Call—
There, Christ is born again.

Wherever vision of the Light
Disturbs the sleeping souls of men,
Night trails away its shadowy flight—
And Christ is born again.

Wherever soul in travail turns,
And climbs the barriers that constrain,
With steady cheer Hope's sweet lamp burns—
And Christ is born again.

Where one foul thing is purged away,
And life delivered of one strain,
Love rims with gold the coming day—
And Christ is born again.

A Year.

A year is like a loaf of bread,
All fresh and fair and new,
With every day a little slice
From off that loaf for you.

And sprinkled sometimes through the loaf
To make the flavor good,
Are raisins—holidays that come
Exactly as they should.

This year is like a loaf of bread,
So fresh and new and fair,
And when it's nibbled all away
Another waits you there!

The New Year Scarf.

M. L. G.

Every little girl thinks her own grandmother is the very best grandmother in the world, and with good reason; but Marian thought she had more reason than Evey, or May, or any child she knew. Marian's grandmother was a little gray-and-white lady, with cheeks like the pale tea-roses that grew on the garden fence; with warm, cuddly hands that knew how to do many wonderful things, and a memory stocked with delightful stories and songs to beguile a little girl when the day grew long, and it was not light enough to play, nor dark enough to pull the beady chain that lighted the big sitting-room lamp.

Grandmother could make a fine hen which served to shield her hand when she put up the blower on her "Open Franklin" stove; she could cut rows of gay, dancing gentlemen or ladies dressed like Bo-Peep, all holding hands; she could sing "The Frog Went Courting" and "Come O'er the Seas, Charlie," with equal grace, and in a voice unlike any other; small and inclined, perhaps, to be chipped around the edges, but to Marian the most satisfactorily cheerful and sweet.

But I am going to tell you of Marian's New Year Scarf, which it took grandmother a whole year to make. It was begun on one first of January, when the snow was falling so that the world, seen from the window, seemed a mist of whirling flakes. Marian had been out to play in it, and came into grandmother's room rosy and laughing, with flakes still clinging to her eyelashes.

"It's fine, grandmother, but I do get cold," she cried, as she came to warm her hands at the fire. "This old scarf is getting thin." She pulled it off as she spoke, and sure enough there were places where it was so worn that there was hardly any scarf there at all.

"Well, childie, let it do for this winter," answered grandmother, going to her work-table, where were kept so many skeins of wool and silk of every color, that it looked as if a rainbow had gotten tangled among them. "But I will start right now on a new one. This will grow slowly, but by next New Year it will be ready for you."

That morning grandmother knit only ten rows across, to begin the scarf. The ten rows were white. "For that is the color of January," said grandmother.

Soon Evey came over to play, and Marian forgot all about the scarf, until one day in February, when she came in from school with a frowning face.

"It is so muddy outside, grandmother," she said, fretfully; "see, it splashed up over my shoe; such a brown spot on my white stocking."

"Run to mother, then, and ask her for another pair, and you can bring them in here to put on," answered grandmother, as she put away the letter she was reading, and went toward her work-table.

When Marian came dancing in with the clean stockings, she saw grandmother, with a ball of brown wool, and the New Year scarf in her hands.

"Here begins the February strip!" said grandmother, smiling. "The brown mud means spring is coming"; and soon the ten brown rows were done.

In March Marian found a bright yellow crocus; and she laughed to see grandmother, when she had stuck the crocus in the big cameo pin she always wore, start toward her work-table.

"A yellow strip for March, I know!" she sang; and so it was.

Every month the New Year scarf grew. In April it had a lovely pale green strip, just like the leaves that were unfolding on the big maple outside grandmother's window; and May's strip was lilac, for all the time grandmother was knitting the ten rows, Marian sat on a low stool, with her nose buried in a big fragrant bunch of lilacs.

June brought the roses, and such beauties there were! "I declare," said Marian's mother, as she came into grandmother's rooms with her hands full of them; "I believe the roses this year are the finest we've ever had. Just see this crimson beauty; and this cluster of sunset glow."

"That they are beautiful!" answered grandmother. "I know I'm old-fashioned, to prefer my little tea-rose to these fine flowers. But I have happy associations with my pink tea-rose"; and she smiled toward the mantlepiece, where a vase full of them bloomed beneath grandpa's picture.

"I think I'd like to have happy 'sociations with them, too," whispered Marian, as she leaned against grandmother's shoulder. "So, will you make my June strip of that pale pink color?"

In July Marian went with father to the seashore. Every day she put on her new bathing suit for a frolic in the waves; and one day she sent a post-card back to grandmother, saying: "I want my July strip to be blue, for that is the color of the sky and the ocean here; and when I wear my scarf, even on a winter day, I will remember my good time at the beach."

August's strip was green again—a deeper green than April's had been; it was just the color of the rustling leaves in the grove, where Marian and Evey and May, with all the other children in their Sunday school, had their jolly picnic. And in September a purple strip went on, like the asters Marian brought to grandmother from Evey's mother, who gave them to Marian as she joined Evey on the way to school, the first day of the new session. The new teacher put them in a glass of water for Marian, and there they stayed all that morning, and nodded at the bright faces of the children.

In October the maple tree turned yellow—so yellow that it made a glow of light in grandmother's room one sunny morning. "I have just the color for the scarf," said grandmother, as she and May stood by the window. "A deeper yellow than the March strip, and bright enough to remind us of these brightest days of the year." And she took from her work-table a ball of wool so bright that Marian clapped her hands to see the vivid color against September's purple.

When November came Marian was a sad and awed little girl. Dear grandmother was very ill with pneumonia, and two doctors came, and one day father stayed home from the office, and mother leaned her head on his shoulder and cried. Marian went in and stood by grandmother's bed. It was a dark morning. The maple tree was bare, and a cold rain was falling. By grandmother's bed sat a nurse all in white, and she motioned to Marian not to talk. But grandmother smiled a little smile, and whispered in a little whisper, "Don't you trouble, honey; I hope we shall finish that scarf yet!" And on the very last day of November grandmother sat up in her chair and knitted ten gray rows.

The scarf was finished on Christmas Eve. How fast the red December strip grew, and how merrily the knitting-needles clicked, as grandmother and Marian sat by the Open Franklin, and Marian finished hemming father's handkerchief. (Mother's was finished, and wrapped in tissue paper and gold cord.)

All through the Christmas holidays Marian hoped for snow on New Year's Day; and awoke on that morning to a shining white day, of snow and ice. Breakfast was soon over, and Marian, dressed warmly in coat and cap, ran in to grandmother room. Grandmother herself wrapped the bright scarf around her neck and kissed her.

"There's your whole year of colors to keep you warm!" she said.

Make-Believe.

Sometimes I'm mother's little fox,
A nice one, very tame;
And then we play that one glad day
Out of the woods I came.

When I'm a fox her little girl
Has always gone away;
I don't forget to say: "We met
Out in the woods today."

Then mother makes the loveliest den,
All deep and dark and snug.
(Table, you know, that's used to sew,
All covered with a rug.)

And then, while mother sits and sews,
I cuddle in my den
Or else steal out and prowl about
And then go in again,

Till—oh, I need my mother's arms
And do not want to roam;
I creep up close and smile. She knows
Her little girl's come home!

Bees That Could.

By Mary Louise Stetson.

When Bobby arrived at his grandfather's farm he found his grandmother mixing some of her wonderful biscuits.

"Grandfather," Bobby said, "don't you think honey would taste good on those biscuits?"

He had heard about the bee-hives on the farm, and he was eager to taste the fresh honey.

Grandfather stroked his beard. "Getting honey in broad daylight is a risky business, young man," he said, "but I'll see what I can do."

Bobby wanted to go with him to the hives, but grandfather thought it would be better for him to keep away. The little boy was willing to run the risk of being stung, but he took his stand obediently at the window and watched the old gentleman go across the road to the place where the beehives stood.

As warily as a thief grandfather crept toward the hive, where a few bees were still flying about. Bobby held his breath as he watched him reach in and take out a box of honey.

Bobby leaned out of the window. "The biscuits are nearly ready!" he cried. But to his surprise grandfather carried the precious box to the doorway of a shed, set it inside and left the door open a crack before he turned away.

"We shall have to do without honey for supper," he said. "There are still bees in the box. We can't make them come out. All we can do is just to leave an opening and let them go home when they feel like it. But cheer up, Bob, you may have honey on your johnny-cake for breakfast!"

So that night Bobby ate raspberry jam on his biscuits and looked forward to the next morning.

Meanwhile the bees that saw the box of honey carried away from the hive had buzzed the sad news to every other bee on the place, and they all began to buzz their anger as only bees can. Grandfather, grandmother and Bobby were safe indoors, and as no one happened to pass by, no one was stung. But the more they buzzed about the wrong the angrier the bees became. They swarmed about the hive and about the shed, and scolded and scolded and scolded.

The next morning Bobby felt lazy. "Grandmother, won't you please lace my shoes for me?" he asked.

"Tut! tut!" said grandfather, coming in from the yard. "Can't lace your shoes?"

"But my fingers are clumsy, grandfather," Bobby explained.

"Tut! tut!" grandfather said again. "A swarm of bees mustn't do better than a great, husky boy! They don't say, 'I can't'; they say, 'I can.' And, what's more, they do!"

Bobby looked puzzled. "I don't know what you mean," he said.

"Lace your shoes and I'll show you," grandfather replied.

Bobby's fingers were no longer clumsy. A few moments later he was following his grandfather out to the shed where he had left the box of honey. The box was still there.

"Shall we take it in to grandmother?" Bobby asked.

The old gentleman shook his head. "She wouldn't have any use for that box. Lift it, Bob."

Bobby obeyed. "Why, what makes it so light?" he cried. "What's happened?"

Grandfather laughed. "About a thousand bees said, 'I can'; that's what happened, boy. I carried off their honey last night, and now they've taken it back to the hive—all but the comb and the box. I hadn't kept bees long enough to be up to all their tricks."

"No honey for breakfast!" Bobby said slowly. "But it was smart of them, I declare it was!"

Just then grandmother came to the door with the breakfast bell in her hand.

"Hot cakes and maple syrup!" she called.

Bobby set off on a run. "The bees can't get that, anyway!" he said.—Exchange

Clever Bird and Stupid Beast.

The ostrich and the rhinoceros are stupid. So at least most persons think. But Mr. Carl E. Akeley, who has spent years in hunting, collecting and studying wild animals, says in the World's Work that, though they are right about the rhinoceros, they are wrong about the ostrich. The ostrich, he declares, has brains, and to prove it he tells this experience of his in Africa:

"One day I had been for some time following a wary pair of ostriches when I came to a wide opening in the scrub growth in the centre of which was a dense green bush a dozen feet in diameter. A beautiful cock ostrich broke into the clearing just below the brush, and as I raised my rifle he disappeared behind the bush; so I held myself ready to catch him when he passed out from behind it on the other side. I stood there until I felt foolish. Then I ran quickly to the bush. The ostrich was nowhere to be seen, but his trail told the story. As he had come into the open he had seen me, and so when he got behind the bush he had stopped short, turned at right angles and run straight away, keeping the bush between himself and me. I have not known many animals to do a more clever thing."

But the rhinoceros Mr. Akeley holds up to scorn. "Many experienced hunters," he writes, "consider him as one of the most dangerous African animals. I cannot quite agree with that. Of course, if he runs over you, you are likely to get hurt. It is also true that as soon as he smells you he is likely to start charging about in a terrifying manner. But you have only to get out of the way and let him charge by; sometimes even that is not necessary."

One day when Mr. Akeley, far ahead of his gun boys, was going along the bank of a river, he heard the thrashings and snortings of a charging rhinoceros. He carried only a camera.

"There was," he says, "nothing to climb. Between me and the thicket from which the rhino was coming was about twenty-five feet of open space. Behind me was a thirty-foot drop to the crocodile-infested waters of the Tana River. The only hope I saw was a bush overhanging the brink; it looked as if it might hold me if I swung out on it. My mind was made up to try the bush and let the rhino land in the river. He came full tilt into the opening and stopped with a snort. His head drooped. His eyes almost closed. He looked as if he were going to sleep! I felt a poke in my back. I reached behind and took my rifle from the gun boy, who had come up. I drew a bead on the old fellow, but I could not shoot. A stupider or more ludicrous object I never saw. There he stood, half asleep and totally oblivious, while I, with the gun half aimed, talked to him about his ugly self. About that time my porters came into hearing. The rhino pricked up his ears, charged through the safari and off into the bush."

Mr. Akeley believes that the rhinoceros is more inquisitive than ferocious. His eyesight is poor, and when he smells something he comes charging toward it to investigate. His blundering bad manners are getting him shot so frequently that already an old rhinoceros with a large horn is a rarity.

"Where are you going? Never mind:
Just follow the signboard that says 'Be ... kind.'
Do the duty that nearest lies:
That is the road to paradise."

Origin of the Christmas Stocking.

From Italy comes the legend from which we are supposed to get the time-honored custom of hanging up the Christmas stocking.

Good old St. Nicholas of Padua used to throw long knitted purses tied at both ends into the open windows of the very poor people, and these purses were of yarn, and not unlike a footless stocking. Finally it became the custom of the people to hang these empty receptacles out of their windows on the night before Christmas so that St. Nicholas would put a gift into them as he passed by.

By and by, when the coin of the realm became scarce, toys were put in for the children and useful presents for grown people.

In the north country, where it was rather chilly at Christmas time, the purses were hung on the mantel-piece, and it was believed that the good saint would come down the chimney and fill them. When these purses went out of fashion, stockings were substituted, and have been used ever since.—Ex.

A Cracked Commandment.

"I don't see how he ever did it, ma! A bully good fellow like Ned. Atcually to take money from Jackson's cash drawer—a thief—I can't believe it."

"He must have been sorely tempted, son," replied the little woman in grey, bending over her darling. "Those clerks do handle a lot of money, first and last."

"He said he meant to put it back next week, sure—but 'twas stealing just the same." Here Tom took a judicial tone, with just a wee bit of the Pharisee in it.

"Do you remember"—here the stocking his mother was mending dropped, and she became tremendously in earnest—"do you remember how you coaxed Ned to go after old Mr. Jones' apples last October? You confessed he didn't want to at first—"

"But, say, ma, that was just to have some fun!"

"They weren't any more your own than Jackson's cash," she went on gravely. "Let's see, you smashed a pitcher this morning."

"'Twas cracked before," the boy hastened to explain, delighted at the change of subject. "It just fell to pieces in my hands."

"How about cracking the Eighth Commandment? I know you wouldn't think of breaking it."

"The Eighth—the Eighth—which? Oh, yes; 'Thou shalt not'—um—" Tom meditated, kicking his heels into the worn place in the carpet.

At last, a gleam of comprehension burst into his eyes. "Oh—you mean I got Ned to crack the commandment about stealing when we swiped those apples, so it's partly my fault now he's broken it, and everybody's calling him a thief."

His mother nodded. "I know you didn't mean to, dear," she put it gently, "but remember, commandments are like crockery, once cracked, easily broken."—Belfast Witness.

Nothing will help us to live in this world, and keep ourselves unspotted, but the Spirit that was in Christ, that looked upon His body as prepared by God for His service; that looks upon our body as prepared by Him, too, that we might offer it to Him. Like Christ, we, too, must yield our body with every member, every power, every action, to fulfil His will, to be offered up to Him, to glorify Him.—Andrew Murray.

Christmas at the Barries.

The Barry family were used to having a pretty good time always. Rich? No, not a bit of it! Father worked just as hard as he could work in the village and came home at night to the little farm and worked some more there, if mother and we children would let him. And mother! Well, she ran that tiny farm and cooked and patched and bossed us five children. Of course we helped all we could. Sister Nell was just eighteen, but she was one of the best school teachers that ever grew. I know, because think of what I know, and she taught me every bit!

I want to tell about last Christmas. I started out by saying we always have a good time, and of course Christmas is our specialest, special time. But last year was such a different one, and yet so nice!

Aunt Laura had just come back from France, where she'd been nursing Red Cross soldiers for all the war, and she wanted to know all of our plans for Christmas. We told her everything, and she was almost as happy as we were over the little surprises we had ready. We had mighty little to spend, but we were all so happy and it was so good for all to be together that we just boiled over. Then Aunt Laura said to me, "Lucy, do you children see anything of Rex Price these days?"

I said, "No'm, Rex is too rich." He lived in the biggest house in town, just his dog and the servants, and—his mother, too, but she was always going to New York and places. Rex didn't go to school; he had a governess; I forgot to mention her. Then Aunt Laura said, "Do you remember 'Birds Christmas Carol' and how all the poor little Ruggles were invited to the rich Bird's house for Christmas, and had such a gorgeous time?" I remembered, and then she said, "Let's us be the Ruggles, and have Rex the Bird" (he was the only one, you know), "and we'll pay back for that good fun they gave us."

Mother didn't exactly like our calling ourselves the Ruggles, for we did have enough clothes to go round, enough to eat, and we thought our manners were beautiful. But she said we could ask Rex, and oh, how excited we were for fear he wouldn't come. But his people—nurses and governess and all that, said he could. And then we were so excited for fear he wouldn't like our home and the way we had things. He was just Harry's age, eight, and that would help, we hoped. He came, right after breakfast. He said the servants wanted to shut the house up early, and he helped us open our presents and play with them. Then we all piled into the Ford and went to church, and after that the real fun began. Rex was a little stiff at first. (Nell said he'd be stiffer still in the morning after riding that calf), but after a little while he limbered up and was just more fun than anything. How he did romp and play. Mother and Aunt Laura would slip to the door and watch him, and father said Santa Claus must have brought Rex his laugh—it was so merry and Christmasy.

Then we had dinner—just a plain country dinner, mother called it. My, but it was good! Turkey, of course, and Rex ate just as heartily as any of us, and didn't put on any airs at all.

After dinner we sang some carols, played more games, and had some more romps out in the barnyard. When it was dark Rex's big car came driving up for him, but he didn't want to get in. Finally father said, "Come on, children, let's all walk home with Rex"—it wasn't but half a mile away—"and you'll have a nice little walk in the moonlight." We all went, and Rex was so sorry to say good-bye he cried.

We are all old friends now, he and Harry are real chums, even if he is rich, and Christmas is nearly here, and of course Rex will spend it with us.—Frances West, in Carolina Churchman.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Mass Meeting.

A mass meeting of Churchmen and women of the Archdeaconry of Harrisburg was held in the Penn Harris Hotel, Harrisburg, on December 15. The parishes in the Archdeaconry were for the most part represented. Addresses were made by Dr. Patton, of Atlanta, Ga., on "What One Man Can Do," and by George C. Thomas, Esq., of Baltimore, on "What One Woman Can Do." These addresses were warmly seconded by General C. M. Clement, of Sunbury, Secretary of the Convention of the Diocese of Harrisburg, and by Richard M. H. Wharton, Esq., of Harrisburg, Treasurer of the Diocese, and by John C. Schmidt, of York. A list of stirring hymns, prepared specially for the use of this meeting, were heartily sung under the leadership of Mr. John F. O'Niel, of St. Andrew's, Harrisburg.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

St. John's Parish, Savannah (the Rev. William T. Dakin, rector), which has had a Healing Mission, followed by a Preaching Mission, held recently, what the rector called an "educational mission," in preparation for the Every-Member Canvass which had to be delayed on account of the meeting of the Provincial Synod which was held in this parish in October. The rector, by using the charts of the Nation-Wide Campaign, gave an inspirational talk at a parish meeting in the church building, smaller group meetings having been held in many neighborhoods previous to this conference. In going over the parish list, it was found that three hundred and thirty-one members of the parish are doing active work almost weekly.

The Churchman's Club of Thomasville gave a banquet on December 8 at which the honor guest and the speaker of the occasion was the Rev. John D. Wing, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Savannah. Other speakers were Mr. J. B. Jemison, president of the Rotary Club of Thomasville, and Mr. T. T. Caldwell, president of the Churchman's Club. The women of Thomas' Guild served the banquet.

St. Paul's Parish, Augusta (the Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney, rector), feels that the most important event that has taken place in the parish life in years is the formation of the Young People's Service League, which meets every Sunday evening. From forty to forty-five young people attend, and are under the leadership of Miss Alva Willingham, who trained for this work under the Rev. Gordon Reese at the Sewanee Summer Training School for Workers last August.

The Church School Service League of Christ Church, Savannah (the Rev. John D. Wing, D. D., rector), after only one month's organization, has sent off three Christmas boxes to a mission in New Mexico, thus completing the first block for the nation.

A revelation can pierce through everything but one—an opposing interest. That was Christ's heaviest obstacle—the obstacle from which He shrank. Why did He put out the hired mourners before healing the daughter of Jairus? It was because the hired mourners had a contrary interest to Himself. Jesus resented the countercurrent. He could bear with doubt, He could bear with temptation, He could bear with sin; but with the presence of an adverse sympathy He could not bear.—Matheson.

IN MEMORIAM.

MRS. LOUISA VIRGINIA SCOTT and MRS. MILDRED MARY LITTLE.

Born in Arnolds Valley, Rockbridge County, Virginia, under the shadows of the Blue Ridge Mountain, and near the present summer encampment (Camp Kent) of the Y. M. C. A., MRS. LOUISA VIRGINIA SCOTT and MRS. MILDRED MARY LITTLE, daughters of Charles Lewis and Louvenia Claiborne Cheatwood Burks, both spending the last years of their life, in the city Lynchburg, at the home of their daughter and niece, Mrs. Margaret Scott.

Mrs. Scott died Sunday night, March 13, 1921, in the ninety-second year of her age, and is survived by 79 descendants. She was buried in the family burying ground, near what was her old home during the Civil War, and on a part of which now stands the Virginia Episcopal School. She lived a long and useful life, and was active to within a few years of her death, when she had a fall, which caused her to be a great sufferer, but her mental faculties were ever bright, and she always looked on the bright side of life, and her friends enjoyed dropping in for cheerful talks with her, even in her extreme old age. She was a consistent member of the Episcopal Church, and it was an inspiration to see her, until her eyesight became impaired, daily reading her Bible.

As the day dawned on the 11th of December, 1920, the calm spirit of her sister, MRS. MILDRED MARY LITTLE, left the body, that had been so weakened by physical suffering. Her remains were taken to Monticello, Iowa, where they were laid to rest by the side of her husband, and two daughters, who had some years before preceded her to the grave. It had always been her wish, that she be taken back to where she had spent the greater part of her married life. Mrs. Little was born Febrary 29, 1885, and was therefore in the eighty-sixth year of her age, when she passed away. She was also a member of the Episcopal Church, and her beautiful Christian faith, and dependence upon Him, to Whom she ever looked for guidance, and protection, is an example, that her family, and those who knew her intimately, will never forget.

These two sisters—twins in all but years—were devoted to each other, and died so nearly together, and went to the home not made with hands, and are now on the shores where tideless sleep the seas of time, soft by the city of the saints of God.

They came from a large and honored family in the counties of Amherst, Bedford, Campbell and Rockbridge, two members of which, Judge E. C. and Martin P. Burks, have adorned the Supreme Court of the State of Virginia, and the numerous progeny of Mrs. Louisa Scott are now filling many of the useful walks of life.

W. EUSTACE MONCURE.

Died on the 12th day of December, 1921, W. EUSTACE MONCURE, youngest and only remaining son of the late Judge R. C. L. Moncure, of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, and his wife, Mary Washington Conway, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. He is survived by his widow, who was Miss Mary Knox, of Falmouth, Va., and five children: Mrs. H. R. Sweetser; and R. C. L. Moncure, of Fredericksburg; Miss Frances Moncure, Mrs. Margaret Atkinson and Robert Moncure, of Washington, and two sisters, Mrs. Thomas Wallace, of Falmouth, Va., and Mrs. W. R. D. Moncure, of Richmond, Va. Interment in the family burying-ground at Glencairne, Stafford Couty, Va.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Edwin R. Carter, rector of St. John's Church, Hampton Va., has declined the call to Grace Church, Petersburg, to succeed the Rev. Dr. C. Braxton Bryan, who tendered his resignation several weeks ago.

The Rev. A. W. S. Garden, who has ably filled the office of Executive Secretary of the Diocese of Erie for the past year, has resigned, and has accepted a call to Emmanuel Church, Pittsburgh. Mr. Garden will begin his duties on January 1.

The Rev. C. S. Kitchin, who was formerly in charge of Kane and Mt. Jewett, Pa., has taken up temporary work at St. Andrew's Church, Clearfield, Pa.

The Rev. B. T. Kemmerer, field secretary of the Nation-Wide Campaign, held a series of inter parochial services in Wilmington, N. C., recently. The subject of a number of addresses delivered by Mr. Kemmerer was "Stewardship."

The Rev. Joseph R. Lynes, of St. Paul's Church, Jersey City, N. J., has accepted an invitation to the rectorship of St. Paul's, Englewood, N. J., expecting to begin his work on February 1.

The Rev. W. E. Daw, for nearly four years pastor of Trinity Church, Sharon Springs, N. Y., has accepted a call to the rectorship of Holy Cross Church, Fort Plain, with charge of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Canajoharie, N. Y., in the Diocese of Albany. He will enter on his new duties on February 1, 1922. He has previously served the church at Crosswicks, N. J., Spottswood, N. J., Towanda, Pa., and Athens, Pa.

The Rev. and Mrs. Alfred E. Macnamara are at Hot Springs, Ark., where Mr. Macnamara is critically ill. Three months ago he was forced to retire from active service, on account of rheumatism, from which he has suffered for years. During the war he was at St. Luke's, Eddystone, Pa.

The Rev. Dr. Percy T. Fenn has been unanimously elected dean of Trinity Cathedral, Little Rock, Ark. Dr. Fenn moved to Syracuse only one year ago, and this is a call back to his old province, which he served for sixteen years. He has the matter under advisement.

MARVEL OF THE HUMAN HEART.

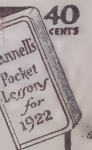
The book which Joseph P. Tumulty, his secretary, has written about him is not the adequate biography which history is waiting for. Let that be said at the outset, that there be no exaggerated expectations, and therefore no exaggerated disappointment. It is known that some of Mr. Wilson's closest friends are deeply distressed that the book was written. It seems to some a betrayal of confidence—a revelation of intimate facts and of personal documents which none had a right to make public unless it should be Mr. Wilson alone. "I suspect," says Mr. Tumulty himself in his preface, "this book * * * will not be read by Mr. Wilson. * * * He craves the silence from others which he imposes upon himself. Knowing this, I have not consulted him about this book."

Why, then, is the book written? "Because," says Mr. Tumulty, "I am anxious that his contemporaries should know him as I have known him, not only as an individual, but also as the advocate of a set of great ideas and as the leader of great movements. If I can picture him, even imperfectly, as I have found him to be, both in himself and in his relationship to important events, I must believe that the portrait will correct some curious misapprehensions about him."

"Even imperfectly, as I have found him to be"—those words are the keynote to a right appraisement of this book. It is not a revelation of the fulness of Mr. Wilson's self. It is simply the reflection of him as we catch it from the mirror of one man's mind, and the reflection is subject to the qualities of the mirror. This book has not the philosophic breadth of Professor Dodd's "Woodrow Wilson and His Work," issued earlier this year by the same publishers. Sometimes also the light falls so that we see the mirror and not the reflection in it. But when all qualifications are made, it stands true that this book does give glimpses of Mr. Wilson which are of vital interest; and even though his discrimination and taste be not without fault, nevertheless Mr. Tumulty has given information which no future historian can ignore.

In his preface, Mr. Tumulty expresses his desire—as we have already quoted—"to correct some curious misapprehensions" about Mr. Wilson. Two particularly he refers to: "the sedulously cultivated report * * * that he has been uniformly headstrong, impatient of advice, his mind hermetically closed to counsel from others"; and, second, "that Mr. Wilson lacks human warmth." The book does present effective refutation of both these ideas, especially of the first; and among the most valuable chapters in the book are those dealing with Mr. Wilson's campaign for the governorship of New Jersey in the course of which Mr. Tumulty first came—impatiently in the beginning—to know the deliberate hospitality which then and afterwards marked Mr. Wilson's attention to ideas from many quarters before he framed his own decision. "Contrary to the misrepresentations," writes Mr. Tumulty "he had from time to time many advisers. In most instances, I do not possess written reports of what others said orally and in writing, and therefore in this record, which is essentially concerned with my own official and personal relations with him, I may seem to represent myself as a preponderating influence. This is neither the fact nor my intention. The public acts of Mr. Wilson were frequently mosaics, made up of his own ideas and those of others. My written notes were merely stones offered for the mosaic. Sometimes the stones were rejected, sometimes accepted and shaped by the master builder into the pattern."

In the light of subsequent history, one of the most interesting chapters in the book is that which recounts the story of the relations between Wilson and George Harvey—the support which Harvey originally gave to his campaign for the presidential nomination, the reasons why that support was withdrawn, the growth of Harvey's enmity—all of which was already generally known—and Mr. Wilson's unsuccessful effort to restore the original friendship, which to most people has never been known before.



The Mexican problem, the domestic policies of the Wilson administration, the coming of the war and Wilson's attitude toward it, "the great declaration" of America's entrance, the reasons why Wilson went to Paris, and the ends he sought to accomplish there, his appeal for a Democratic Congress, his campaign across the United States and his physical collapse—of all the book tells; and if the reader can get over the exasperation of feeling Mr. Tumulty's personality continually about, he can unquestionably get glimpses into scenes vibrant with the high emotions of history and a view of Mr. Wilson as a figure moving very greatly against a background which would have dwarfed the ordinary man. Will not this, for example, be worth remembering whenever men think of war? "For a while" (when President Wilson had just come back from the Capitol, where he read his message urging that America enter the lists against Germany), "he sat silent and pale in the cabinet room. At last he said, 'Think what it was they were applauding' (he was speaking of the people who were lined along the streets on his way to the Capitol). 'My message today was a message of death for our young men. How strange it seems to applaud that.'"

And the review of the book may well close with the paragraph which closes the book itself. It describes the departure from the Capitol on the morning when the eight years in the presidency came to an end:

"Quickly Woodrow Wilson, now the private citizen, turned to make his way to the elevator, leaning on his cane, the ferrule striking sharply on the stone pavement as he walked; but his spirit was indomitable. A few minutes before all interest had been centred upon him. Now but a few loyal friends remained behind. Interest was transferred to the scene being enacted a few feet away in the Senate Chamber, the induction into office of Vice-President Coolidge. By the time we reached the elevator, the brief ceremony in the Senate Chamber had ended, and the multitude outside were cheering Mr. Harding as he appeared at the east front of the Capitol to deliver his inaugural address. We heard the United States Marine Band playing 'Hail to the Chief.' For a few seconds I looked toward the reviewing stand. The new President, Warren G. Harding, was taking his place on the stand amid the din and roar of applause. He was the focus of all eyes, the pivot around which all interest turned. Not one of the thousands turned to look at the lonely figure laboriously climbing into the automobile. The words of Ibsen flashed into my mind:

'The strongest man in the world is he who stands most alone.'"

What Task Was Given the Church by Her Master?

How Is This Church Working At This Task?

If you held a responsible business position and were assigned a task, you would need a clear idea of the task and of the way to perform it. You would demand such information or refuse to be responsible.

Every member of the Church has an individual responsibility for the task given to the Church. If you are not able to answer the above questions fully and clearly, do you not think it is your duty to take advantage of an opportunity to secure this necessary and vitally important information?

TOPICS FOR THE SEVEN SESSIONS

1. The Mission of the Church and Her Responsibility.
2. The Task of the Church in Missions and Church Extension.
3. The Task of the Church in Christian Social Service.
4. The Task of the Church in Religious Education.
5. The Organization of the Church for Meeting Her Task.
6. Christian Stewardship.
7. The Source of Power.

The Task of the Church

Is a book answering these questions briefly but comprehensively. It has just been issued by the Presiding Bishop and Council for the use of Discussion Groups of adults. It is suitable also for reading by anyone unable to become a member of a Discussion Group.

This book is an elementary programme, arranged for seven sessions. It is elementary, not in the sense that it is prepared for the use of children, but in the sense that it discusses the elements of the subject. It covers all the fundamental principles and facts of the situation. The programme is the joint production of all the departments involved.

In addition to the material prepared as a basis of discussion, detailed suggestions for leaders are given in connection with the matter for each session.

The Discussion Group method is becoming very popular throughout the Church. The leader of a Discussion Group does not lecture or conduct recitations, but guides discussions which can be participated in by all the members. A free leaflet, "How to Lead a Discussion Group," may be obtained on request.

It is hoped that one or more Discussion Groups, using this book, will be formed in every parish and mission of the Church. Every adult member of the Church should have the benefit of this study.

Orders for "The Task of the Church" should be sent to the Educational Division, 281 Fourth Ave., New York City. Price, 25 cents, postpaid.
